Kuwait mobilises its reserve forces as Saddam moves Republican Guards

Clinton warns Iraq as tanks head south

BY MARTIN FLETCHER, JAMES BONE AND MICHAEL EVANS

PRESIDENT Clinton delivered a firm warning to Baghdad last night during a day of drama when two Iraqi Republican Guard divisions armed with 350 tanks were spotted heading for the Kuwaiti border.

Mr Clinton warned President Saddam Hussein "not to repeat the same mistake he made" in 1990 when 100,000 Iraqi troops invaded Kuwait and were driven out by US-led coalition forces in a six-week air and land battle.

The latest serious sabre-rattling by Saddam was over Gulf War sanctions which have crippled Iraq's economy over the past four years. On Thursday Saddam threatened "unspecified consequences" if the Security Council did not set a deadline for lifting or easing sanctions "when it meets next Monday".

Mr Clinton said in a statement from the White House: "Saddam Hussein should be under no illusions, the US is not otherwise occupied... it would be a grave mistake of Saddam Hussein to believe that the US might have weakened its resolve."

The President said he and General John Shalikashvili, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, had taken unspecified military steps to deter renewed Iraqi aggression.

Last night, as Kuwait's

Two Iraqi divisions armed with tanks head south towards Kuwait border army reserves were mobilised, Kuwaiti diplomatic sources in London claimed that as many as five Iraqi divisions were advancing towards the border. American reports, however, referred to two divisions, one mechanised and one armoured, totalling 20,000 to 30,000 troops. A US official said two divisions of the Republican Guard had begun moving south "in recent days" and that a brigade of about 5,000 men was already near the Kuwaiti frontier.

"As the other units advanced 'provocatively' towards the southern Iraqi towns of Basra and Amara near the border with Kuwait, Tariq Aziz, the Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister, called on the international community to examine the 'iniquitous and illegitimate situation' under which he said one or two big powers were preventing the lifting of Gulf War sanctions against his country. Both the United States and Britain are firmly opposed to lifting sanctions. William Perry, the US Defence Secretary, said the Iraqi troop movements were "not routine and not typical of what we have seen in the past and therefore do cause us concern". Madeleine Albright, the US Ambassador to the UN, warned Iraq not to test the world's commitment to protect Kuwait.

A US official said a significant movement of troops was involved, "but it does not represent the same size force (as the one mobilised) prior to the invasion of Kuwait".

However, a UN official said: "This military activity is highly unusual and is reminiscent of the Iraqi build-up just prior to the invasion of Kuwait, when they used two armoured divisions and one mechanised division."

Asked about Iraq's so-called "charm offensive" to seek the lifting of sanctions at the UN, an American official said: "We don't find this very charming." American officials said the US was "fully prepared to respond to any act of aggression". The State Department warned Saddam that "confrontational tactics will prove no more successful now than in the past".

The Foreign Office had said

Tariq Aziz, who complained to the United Nations about "iniquitous" sanctions earlier that any contravention of the Security Council resolutions would be "a grave error of judgement".

The first warning of troop movements towards Kuwait came from the Iraqi National Congress, a group opposed to Saddam's regime, which claimed that up to three divisions, including units from the Republican Guard, were advancing south.

The Pentagon was preparing plans urgently for sending military reinforcements to the region if necessary. The nearest aircraft carrier is the USS George Washington in the Adriatic. As a continuing deterrent to Iraqi aggression against Kuwait, America has retained squadrons of fighter aircraft, including the combat-proven F117 Stealth fighter, in Saudi Arabia.

Pentagon sources said last night that there were more than 12,000 American military personnel deployed in the region, including 2,000 marines on board four amphibious assault ships, about 1,200 soldiers, 170 special operations troops and nearly 4,000 air force personnel. There is a total of 11 American ships in the region.

Britain has six Tornados GR1As based in Saudi Arabia and France has nine Mirage 2000 fighters.

Briton was murdered by cult members in Canada

FROM RICHARD CLEROUX IN OTTAWA, BILL FROST IN GRANGES-SUR-SALVAN AND ANJANA AHUJA

A BRITISH woman, her husband and baby son were murdered by members of the Order of the Solar Temple before the massacres in Switzerland left 48 dead there, Canadian police said yesterday.

Nikki Dutoit, 30, and her husband Antonio, 35, had been stabbed several times, their hands were tied behind their backs, plastic bags were placed over their heads and they were rolled up in a carpet. The body of their three-month-old son, Christopher Emmanuel, was found cradled behind a water heater. His head was also covered with a bag.

The bodies were found in a burnt-out chalet used by the cult near Quebec. The bodies of two other cult members were found at the same place two days ago.

The couple's car was found near Mirabelle International Airport and, as the international hunt continued for Luc Joutet, the cult leader, a warrant was also issued for Joseph di Mambro, the Belgian owner of the ski chalets.

Neighbours of the dead couple said Mr Dutoit worked as a gardener for Mr di Mambro, who is about 70 and had lived in Canada for a number of years.

Mrs Dutoit's mother, Gillian Robinson, lives in Windmill Hill near Halesham, East Sussex. Neighbours said they did not know where Mrs Robinson, a divorcee, was. A statement from the family said: "The whole family are shocked and devastated by the events of the past few days. We are not aware of the full facts and have no more information

Prescott asks Left to back Blair crusade for change

BY PHILIP WEBSTER, POLITICAL EDITOR

JOHN Prescott yesterday called on Labour's traditional wing to fall in behind Tony Blair's crusade to change the party as the Blackpool conference ended on a high note.

The deputy leader, in a barnstorming finale, told delegates that the new constitution that will replace Clause Four would "stand as the rock of our socialist convictions for the next century." In clear attempt to reassure the left Mr Prescott said that public ownership was a fundamental part of the socialist faith.

Launching a campaign to push membership up to 500,000 from the present 300,000 by the next election,

Mr Prescott said the conference had prepared Labour for government. It had "served a notice to quit on the most desperate, despicable, scabby, grubby, hopeless, lying, hideously incompetent bunch of third-rate, double-dealing dissemblers this nation has ever seen." It may be new Labour, he said. "But they are still old Tories. And I just can't stomach them." Mr Blair led the conference in the singing of the socialist anthem, The Red Flag.

Rebecca Barclay, a Blackpool pie-shop owner, was catapulted into the conference limelight yesterday by Mr Prescott (Arthur Leathley writes). A remarkable 40th birthday came alive for Miss Barclay when he invited her onto the conference platform to publicise her newly-opened shop after she had urged Mr Prescott to tell delegates about her shop.

When she returned to her six-week-old shop in Topping Street last night, business had already picked up, with town-centre shoppers keen to sample her Scotch pies, which sell for 52p.

Rover workers win 10.7% in two-year 'new deal'

BY KEVIN EASON, MOTORING CORRESPONDENT

ROVER yesterday abolished traditional demarcation lines between white and blue collar workers at the cost of pay rises worth four times the rate of inflation.

A two-year 10.7 per cent pay deal agreed with unions will be a pace-setter for British industry which increasingly wants mobility in all areas of employment.

Other car companies such as Peugeot and Jaguar, which started talks yesterday on a claim for substantial rises for its workers, will be studying the details.

The Rover settlement is worth a basic 3.7 per cent in the first year and 4 per cent in the second year, whichever is higher. In the second year, a 3.7 per cent average for workers earning about £260 weekly now.

However, unions said that many workers would receive bigger rises as the company goes through a substantial regrading exercise to eliminate the difference between white and blue collar workers.

The regrading means Rover has moved to a fully Japanese-style operation in which all workers are treated the same. Although workers in overalls and office staff used the same canteens in the past, the "them and us" mentality of British industry persisted with different conditions of service which often penalised workers on assembly lines.

That has now gone with unions claiming that average pay would go up by 10.7 per cent as the price for removing the barriers. There are also nine improvements in conditions of employment, including extra bereavement leave, an extra day's holiday after 10 years' service and an extra day after 15 years.

Although Rover was last night playing down the settlement as being in line with the rest of the industry, there seems little doubt that the deal is as generous as it is perceptive. Rover now has one of the most forward-thinking labour relations deals in British industry and one which BMW, its German parent company, must envy. The carmaker has been at the forefront of revolutionising industrial relations in the motor industry with its "new deal", which guarantees jobs for life for its 27,000 British workers.

But they have had to agree to move to any job they are asked to do in the company under the terms of the new scheme. At the start of the year, Rover asked for 1,000 volunteers to work on assembly lines because demand for cars was growing.

Workers demanded a reward for the increased flexibility in this pay round and have been handed increases which will be the envy of tens of thousands of workers.

Tony Woodley, chief negotiator for the Transport and General Workers' Union, said: "It is obviously a good deal giving the workers a fair reward for the outstanding contribution they have made over the past year."

Man from the Pru shown the door after 140 years

BY ROBERT MALLER

THE man from the Pru will be officially buried on January 1. The enduring image of the old-fashioned salesman in a hat going from door-to-door or attending the workplace to collect weekly policy contributions is to be replaced by the uninspiring, but more practical system of direct debit.

The Prudential, Britain's largest insurance company, says that the cash collection business, which dates back to 1854, has been declining rapidly. In 1990 the Pru was pulling in £65 million but this fell to just £4 million in the first six months of this year.

The original concept of workplace or home collections was driven by the fact that industrial life assurance paid out a cash lump sum on the death of a member who would then avoid the dreaded "pauper's funeral". Before that there were only so-called "burial clubs" which were usually ill-managed and generally unreliable. The weekly premiums of one or two pence were collected by agents of the insurer.

By 1880 the Pru had become the leading company in the field and was calling at one in three homes throughout the UK and the friendly and caring image endured into this century.

Even into the 1950s the company kept alive the idea of the lovable collection agent who more often than not became a family friend and confidant advising on all manner of things. His approach to business was leisurely and he always had time for a cup of tea and a chat. His trademarks, besides the hat, were a bicycle, a saddle bag to carry the money and a pair of bicycle clips. But stricter legislation on what financial advisers can and cannot say nowadays and, it has to be said, a greater mistrust of insurance salesmen, have made the service impractical.

But while "the man from the Pru" may be on the way out, the home service collection is not altogether finished. Last night, Liverpool Victoria, Britain's largest friendly society, said that it would continue with its home service calls.

Lord Snooty and his Pals need each other

Tories? "I just can't stomach 'em," bellowed John Prescott, Labour's deputy leader, yesterday. "So many snouts in the trough that even the pigs are complaining." The conference loved it. They loved him. He loved them. When Prescott speaks to a large Labour gathering you sense something rarely seen in a modern British politician: real affection for his audience.

Tony Blair is already beginning to snap at them or adopt a tone of baffled rationality, as one might when reasoning with a child. There is also something I have observed in him for the first time this week: a slight haughtiness. Paddy Ashdown seems afflicted by the juxtaposition between himself and his audience of an invisible row of footlights. John Major can look like a head boy keeping order, nervous of his authority. Depending on her mood, Margaret Thatcher might address us either as though we deserved a pat on the head, or a jolly good smack.

But Prescott did without needing to say it what Blair had failed to do though he did say it: Prescott implied: "I'm on your side." He read out a message from a small businessman asking him to give a plug for Betty's Pie Shop as business was not too good. Later he invited the excruciatingly embarrassed Betty on to the rostrum (it was her 40th birthday) and sang — or rather howled — Happy Birthday to You while Betty cringed, and tears filled delegates' eyes.

I watched Tony Blair sitting behind him: pale, tense, aloof, his face set and his hands clasped a little primly. He could almost have been wearing a top hat. He on the one hand, Prescott and his fellow-delegates on the other, reminded me of Lord Snooty and his Pals from The Beano. But Mr Prescott was enjoying himself. "New Labour, New Computer," he declared, adapting this year's slogan to his appeal for funds. It was a knockabout performance. He joked, at his own expense, about gibes over his command of the English language. "I'll spell it out in sentences that even I can understand," he promised. Stumbling once over his speech and coming to a halt, he said: "I did that on purpose so as not to disappoint you." Mr Prescott also ventured triumphantly into statistical science: "If every one of you gets one new member, then we'd double the membership!"

The Winter Gardens warmed to him more than they had warmed on Tuesday to the man now behind him.

But I reminded myself that Tony Blair, though he had been heard uncertainly, was applauded in the rafters when he finished.

There was no mistaking that applause. They did not quite understand Mr Blair and they were not sure they liked him but they knew they needed him. It reminded me of a remark of Ann Leslie's, on radio, to Robert Robinson: "I love it when you talk like that. It reminds me what we lost when they closed the grammar schools." As Prescott stirred the conference to an emotional finale, it struck me that Lord Snooty needs his Pal: but his Pal needs Lord Snooty, too.

It was by one of those unlucky mischances that, as the platform party sang and embraced, Cherie Blair should have leant to kiss her husband just as he moved his head. She pecked into his air and nearly fell over. Plainly the kiss had not been rehearsed. Everything else had. The festivities went like clockwork, to the backing of an excellent trad jazz band. Catching sight of Mrs Gwyneth Dunwoody, MP, dancing in the aisles was a moment to treasure. But even during the singing of Auld Lang Syne, Blair looked uncomfortable. Is that out, though, the ultimate in subliminal image control? Looking uncomfortable in a Scottish sing-song is a potent way to win sympathy from middle England.

Blood-test cases may be quashed

Thousands of motorists found guilty of drink-driving offences since March 1984 may have their convictions quashed because police did not follow the correct procedures over blood tests, the High Court has ruled. Two judges rejected an attempt by Barbara Mills, the Director of Public Prosecutions, to uphold the convictions of seven motorists because she feared overturning them would "open the floodgates" for other drivers.

Lord Justice McCowan, sitting with Mr Justice Gage, said the convictions against the seven could not stand because a number of motorists had already been cleared in similar cases. It would be unfair not to treat the seven in the same way. Police in Merseyside, Cheshire and North Wales had failed to ask motorists when taking a blood sample whether there was any medical reason why they could not take the sample. A CPS spokeswoman said: "Courts have ruled that if motorists are not given the opportunity to answer this question, the procedure for taking blood samples is fatally flawed. The police are the ones who have not used the correct wording."

Cyprus soldiers charged

Three British soldiers based in Cyprus were formally charged yesterday with the kidnapping and murder last month of Louise Jensen, a Danish tour guide, and conspiring to rape her. Rifleman Alan Ford, 26, from Birmingham, Jeff Parnell, 23, from Warley, West Midlands, and Justin Fowler, 26, from Falmouth, Cornwall, all serving with the 1st Battalion, The Royal Green Jackets, were remanded in custody for seven days.

Girl's family to sue

The east London family who waited almost an hour for an ambulance while their child lay dying accused health services yesterday of a "chain of neglect" and said they were planning legal action. Nasima Begum, 11, lay screaming as her family pleaded with ambulance control staff for help during four desperate telephone calls. An ambulance arrived 53 minutes later and Nasima died in the Royal London Hospital.

GCSE marking errors

Errors in the marking of GCSE papers are likely to mean that a north London school is placed misleadingly low in the Government's examination league tables to be published next month. More than 100 English papers taken by girls at John Kelly Girls' Technology College, Brent, are being re-marked by the University of London Examinations and Assessment Council. Among a sample of 15 scripts, 12 girls had grades raised.

Awol soldier arrested

A soldier on leave from the Parachute Regiment serving in Northern Ireland has been arrested in New Zealand accused of trying to extort $4 million from a Dutch businessman. Lance Corporal Nicholas Brown, who was posted as absent without leave yesterday after failing to return to his regiment, was arrested with another Briton, Bryan Cooper, 45, a private investigator from Gloucester.

Journalist in court

A Spanish motoring journalist appeared in court yesterday charged with killing an elderly man while test-driving the new Jaguar XJ6 in Scotland last week. Javier Del Castillo Jarabo, 37, of Madrid, is accused of causing the death by dangerous driving of Jack Munro, 74, a crofter from Kinlochbervie, Highland. Señor Jarabo was freed on bail and allowed to return to Spain. No date was set for his next appearance.

Police dig boy's garden

Police searching for Daniel Handley, the nine-year-old boy missing in east London, are expected to dig up the garden of his home and the house where he used to live at the weekend as hopes fade of finding him alive. The disclosure coincided with the discovery of Daniel's silver BMX bicycle, which was found abandoned by two teenagers close to his home in Beckton. Daniel has not been seen since last Sunday.

Wine and food festival

Attendances at the International Festival of Fine Wine and Food, sponsored by The Times, were sharply up yesterday in spite of the London Underground strike and the withdrawal of the Tube service to Kensington Olympia. Today's programme includes demonstrations by Frances Bissell, The Times cook, and Antony Worrall Thompson of dell'Ugo, plus a public demonstration debut by Michel Roux Jr.

Tube runs despite strike

Efforts by the RMT rail union to cripple London Underground services in support of a pay claim failed when three-quarters of trains ran. All 270 Tube stations were open and several lines, including the Metropolitan and the Jubilee, operated a normal service. Waterloo and City Line was the only line closed. The union executive will meet on Monday but there will be no strikes next week as unions must give seven days' notice of action.

Libel case over Venables

Alan Sugar, the chairman of Tottenham Hotspur, and Tony Berry, the deputy chairman, yesterday launched a libel action against Michael Joseph Ltd, publishers of Venables — The Autobiography, by Terry Venables, the England coach and manager. They claim that they are libelled in the book and seek damages and a ban on further publication of certain passages. They have already started a libel action against Mr Venables.

Porter claims bias ahead of 'homes for votes' hearing

By IAN MURRAY

DAME Shirley Porter, the former leader of Westminster City Council, claimed yesterday that the authority's auditor was so biased against her that he could never reach a fair judgment in the "homes for votes" affair.

John Magill, the auditor, said in a provisional report in January that Dame Shirley and nine other council representatives were guilty of "disgraceful, improper gerrymandering" by running a designated homes sale policy. They are accused of wilful misconduct by selling council houses to boost the Conservative vote in marginal wards, at the expense of the homeless.

Yesterday, at a special preliminary inquiry which he himself granted, Mr Magill had to sit in judgment on his decision to make his announcement on a televised news conference. Anthony Scrivener, QC, counsel for Dame Shirley, asked Mr Magill to disqualify himself from any further involvement in the case. Mr Magill said he would announce his decision at the end of next week.

Mr Scrivener claimed that the language used by the auditor in his provisional report showed he was too biased to reach an objective conclusion. A public hearing of the defence against his findings opens on October 17. Dame Shirley and the other council representatives involved do not want him to preside.

Mr Scrivener told Mr Magill that the strong language he had used during the televised news conference, disclosing his provisional findings, made it virtually impossible for him to come to a different conclusion in a final report.

"Could you really now say that you were wrong?" Mr Scrivener asked. "It would be the biggest retreat since some experts said the Hitler diaries were invalid."

As auditor, Mr Scrivener said, he had to act in a quasi-judicial way. "You must keep an open mind until all the evidence and argument have been heard. You never see a judge appear on television halfway through a hearing to express his provisional views."

Mr Scrivener said the news conference appeared to have been stage-managed. "Stating in public your views and findings in this way was not only inappropriate but it makes it difficult for you ever to withdraw those views," he said. "If you do you will look extremely foolish to the public. The pressures of the public will bear down upon you when you make your final decision."

Mr Scrivener complained that Mr Magill claimed to have conducted "the most thorough, comprehensive, wide-ranging review ever done by a local government auditor". He had said that careful considerations were given to the submissions of those involved, "but I don't know when you did that because I haven't even made them yet".

Andrew Arden, QC, representing the objectors to the designated homes policy who called in the auditor, said the hearing was "frivolous, vexatious and entirely redundant". He said that Mr Magill's inquiry had revealed very serious allegations which had ongoing effects on families trapped in bed and breakfast accommodation.

By A STAFF REPORTER

MEN may not make passes at girls who wear glasses, but they do, it seems, do business with them.

Beverley Hurrell, a 21-year-old hairdresser, found her casual dress code undermined her plans to set up her own business after the salon where she worked closed. She was, she found, too young and silly to lease a shop in the opinion of East Anglian landlords.

The next time Miss Hurrell saw a shop she wanted to rent, she conducted negotiations with the landlord, solicitors and estate agents in a long cream skirt and pale pink jacket and carried a black leather briefcase. She also wore the glasses she usually keeps for watching television.

Within weeks she had taken over premises in Bury St Edmunds, Suffolk, and set up Aristocats. She had also secured a £1,690 grant from the Suffolk Training and Enterprise Council.

The salon, which opened in March, has up to 100 customers a week, employs one full-time and one freelance stylist and has a projected annual turnover of £28,000.

Miss Hurrell said: "I normally wear casual clothes like trousers, leggings, jumpers, shirts and waistcoats for my work. But when I wanted to set up my own salon I discovered that those sort of clothes give the wrong impression for business."

"I spotted what I thought were ideal premises but the landlord seemed convinced that I was just an airhead bimbo and did not stand a chance of succeeding. I decided that I had to do something to change my image."

Peter Alder, of Mid Anglia Enterprise Agency, which authorised the grant, said: "Business is all about presenting a professional image."

Oxford campaign raises £340m

By JOHN O'LEARY EDUCATION EDITOR

OXFORD University has wound up the most successful fundraising campaign ever undertaken by a British educational institution after exceeding its target of £340 million for academic developments.

The university was aiming to raise £220 million in five years when it launched the Campaign for Oxford in 1988. But it was so successful that the target was raised and the period extended within three years. Dr Peter North, the Vice-Chancellor, said that winding up the formal campaign merely marked the "end of the beginning" for the university's development activities. Fundraising will continue through a smaller development programme.

A spokeswoman said the university was consolidating its activities but would continue to seek sponsors for a number of major projects, as well as launching further initiatives in due course. Details of the new programme are yet to be finalised.

Already the money raised has funded 117 academic posts, including 34 professorships. The Bodleian Library and Ashmolean Museum have been modernised, and a language centre, Japanese institute, pharmacology and computing buildings erected.

Smaller projects have included the opening of the university's first two nurseries, refurbishing the running track and the establishment of scholarships for British and overseas students.

Among the largest donations have been $30 million (about £20 million) from the Bristol-Myers Squibb Company for pharmacology, £6 million from the Rhodes Trust mainly to finance academic posts, $8 million (£5.3 million) from the W. K. Kellogg Foundation for continuing education, and £3 million for the English faculty from News International, owners of The Times. Oxford was the first British university to concentrate on raising large sums from its alumni and associated organisations. The total of £341,209,145 accumulated through personal and corporate donations far outstrips those that have followed.

Enid Blyton's letters offer glimpse of writing process

By DALYA ALBERGE, ARTS CORRESPONDENT

UNPUBLISHED letters of Enid Blyton which offer a rare insight into the author who gave children the Noddy and Famous Five books, are to be offered for sale.

Written in the 1950s to a professor of psychology who was researching imagination and thought, the letters reveal for the first time her unusual writing methods.

In a series of nine letters, spanning 46 sheets Blyton (1897-1968) described how she saw her characters in a "visual camera" while her eyes were shut. It was, she said, like a private cinema screen whose images she would copy down on her portable typewriter with her eyes closed.

"It's a 3-dimensional screen," she explained, "complete with sound, smell or taste — & feeling." In one letter, she wrote: "Where I am lucky is that I have such easy access to my imagination... I do not have to wait for inspiration as so many do. I have merely to 'open the sluice gates' and out it all pours with no effort."

She was writing from Beaconsfield to Peter McKellar in Aberdeen, responding to a series of questions he put to her for his book, Imagination and Thinking.

From his home in York-shire, Professor McKellar recalled: "I asked all about her waking fantasy, her dreaming fantasy and her half-awake sleep — hypnogenic or pre-sleep imagery, which in the drowsy state is usually visual but sometimes auditory. She was very much interested in this. Her stories seem to have emerged originally from hypnogenic imagery."

The letters will be sold on November 9 at Woolley and Wallis in Salisbury, Wiltshire.

Baby-faced guru initiated a well-heeled clientele into the free-sex, gun-toting madhouse of his cult

Jouret was a messiah to the middle classes

FROM CHARLES BREMNER IN PARIS AND GEORGE BROCK IN BRUSSELS

TALL, handsome and charismatic, Luc Jouret, the leader of the Order of the Solar Temple cult, matched the profile of the paranoid "messiah" who have marched their flock to doom in recent years. He had a bonus, however: as a doctor from a good Belgian family, he could work the luxury end of the market, attracting the well-heeled and their funds in return for redemption from the ecological armageddon about to befall mankind.

While the Rev Jim Jones of Georgetown and David Koresh of Waco preyed on the social margins, Jouret, 47, a cultivated homoeopath who styled himself a universal time-traveller, pulled in a middle class clientele in a career that spanned all of French-speaking Europe and Canada. The presence of the respected mayor of Richelieu, Quebec, and a high official of the Canadian finance ministry among the dead in Switzerland testified to the hypnotic charms of the baby-faced guru.

"He was a terribly handsome guy who used and abused his title of homoeopathic doctor," Brigitte, a former disciple from Brittany, said yesterday. "On one hand, he handed out innocent advice as simple as walking barefoot in the grass or eating freshly-cut green salad. On the other he would insist that only those who were in his sect would be saved from the imminent apocalypse and would organize black masses for his chosen ones.

Jouret's prime skill, say his apostates, was his ability to filter his faithful from his blander teaching on the feel-good psychology of the New Age and lead them to the successively darker chambers of his mystical world, ultimately initiating them into the free-sex, gun-toting madhouse of his Order of the Solar Temple.

In a typically polished press release sent to the media after the massacre, Jouret defined the exalted fate to which he, as an "elder brother of the Rose-Cross" had led them. "We leave this Earth to find, in all lucidity and in all freedom, a Dimension of Truth and the Absolute." He did not, apparently, deem it worth making the trip with them.

Jouret was admired for his intelligence, but the demonic side was not apparent to his friends and family until he had already established himself as a homoeopath in the late 1970s.

His brother Bernard, director of Belgium's National Geographic Institute, recalled yesterday that his university days at the Free University in Brussels were marked by the ferment of mystical and political thinking of the late 1960s. Jouret flirted with a shadowy communist student group.

"There was nothing to suggest what he did later," he said. "He was very active physically and mentally. He was curious about the future, the cosmos, the big bang, he read a lot. He was a born leader. He was an officer in the army commandos when he did his military service. As a student, he had no interest in religion."

Marc Brunson, a Belgian veterinary surgeon and colleague at the time, said: "He was an especially brilliant guy. He already acted as if he was a guru. He seemed to be coming off the rails. You had to have a certain degree of intelligence to escape from him."

His brother, said Bernard Jouret, was "rebellious against the medical establishment", pinning the start of his conversion to the darker realm to the period when he became interested in Indian mysticism.

Establishing himself as a successful lecturer in the "joie de vivre through homoeopathy", he moved to the Ardennes in early 1981, marrying a Frenchwoman who bore him a son who died four days after birth. His lectures at the time warned against the dangers of sects.

In 1984, he went to Switzerland to found his "International Organisation of the Chivalric Solar Tradition", styling himself the Grand Master. Later he discovered fertile ground in the New Age movement and moved to Quebec.

In 1993, after two sect members were accused of murdering the Canadian minister of public security, a long police investigation ended with a minor firearms conviction.

Luc Jouret: as a student in Brussels "he already acted as if he was a guru"

Canadian co-founder was sect financier

By Bill Frost

JOSEPH Di Mambro has been described as co-founder of the Order of the Solar Temple with Luc Jouret. The 70-year-old French Canadian owned the house outside Montreal at Morin Heights, where two charred bodies were found last Tuesday.

His wife, Jocelyne, owned two of the chalets at Granges-sur-Salvan in Switzerland where 25 corpses were recovered the following day. She was also a leading member of the order and thought to be in charge of "commercial activities".

Nicknamed "The Little Napoleon", Mr Di Mambro had in his long dalliance with mystical organisations once been a member of the Rosicrucian Order. In the 1960s, he created his own Sect of the Pyramids. Mr Di Mambro and Jouret were last seen in Salvan on Tuesday at 4pm.

Mr Di Mambro has been described as a dictatorial character who was well off. He was said to be the sect's financier. The Swiss newspaper La Presse said Jouret, Di Mambro, Jocelyne and a fourth influential member of the sect, Camille Pilet, held a lengthy meeting at a Montreux restaurant on September 30 and that Miss Pilet had since put herself under police protection.

Village haunted by cult leader who held court in cafés

FROM BILL FROST IN GRANGES-SUR-SALVAN

AT THE Café des Alpes in Salvan there is a table no longer used by diners. It was where Luc Jouret regularly held court and preached his gospel of fulfilment through sexual pleasure and freedom to follow the "golden path".

Alexandra, the 21-year-old waitress who served him, seems still slightly under the Jouret spell, as she calls it — even though she will never forget last Wednesday, the smell of smoke and the sound of sirens from the mountain-side above.

Jouret gave Alexandra his own copy of a book of Chinese poetry. He even pointed out verses that she should read and learn. She still guards it jealously, even though she now knows the man she once regarded so highly is in all probability a mass murderer who would have drawn her into his web if he could.

Nelly Decaliet, the beautiful and elegantly-dressed owner of the Café des Alpes, came under Jouret's spell too. He would talk, she would listen — the couple became friendly.

However, Jouret broke his own spell the night last May when he began talking about the Order of the Solar Temple. Nelly told him she disapproved of cults and all they stood for. Jouret's manner changed abruptly. He finished his meal, paid his bill, and left Café des Alpes, never to return.

Although frequently seen at Cheiry, where 23 of his followers died in the early hours of last Wednesday, Granges-sur-Salvan was Jouret's real Swiss home. He owned at least one chalet there, and rented two others. He had recently applied for citizenship, giving the village as his place of residence. His followers — Swiss, French and Canadian — were, according to the people of Salvan, a "strangely private and silent lot". Certainly they would smile and be the model of politeness when they came to the village to shop.

The baker had "his doubts though. They seemed to be on a different wavelength. After a while you felt yourself shiver — some of us thought they were 'like' zombies," he recalled.

When the last of the bodies was brought from the smouldering chalets at Granges as darkness fell on Wednesday night, the rescue workers too seemed like zombies. Later in a bar they drowned their shock in calvados and cognac.

Jouret was in the same bar last Saturday, deep in conversation with a "strikingly beautiful" blonde woman. Then the bar phone rang, a long distance call from a man with a German-Swiss accent asking for Jouret urgently.

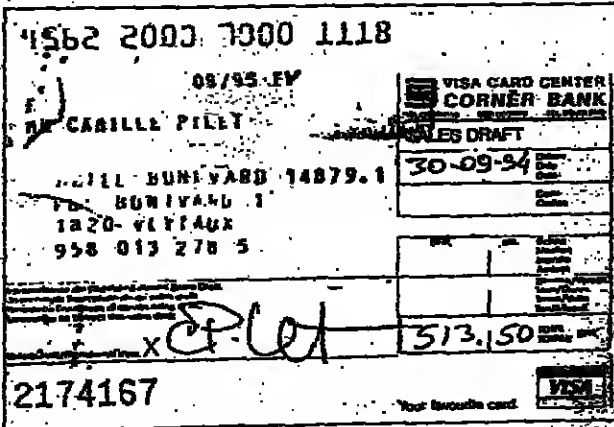

After a brief conversation he returned to his companion. Then the pair left the bar and drove down to the chalets in their jeep. With the benefit of hindsight, the chronology of the tragedy now becomes clear. The Order of the Solar Temple was beginning to fall apart, in Canada where the cult began and in Switzerland where Jouret had sought refuge after a brush with the Montreal police over a weapons possession charge.

Anger over Jouret's profligate spending and increasingly bizarre behaviour had driven a wedge between him and his once-plant acolytes. Cult followers were also at odds with their founding father, Joseph Di Mambro, who fled Jouret is believed to have fled Switzerland after Wednesday's mass killing.

Pascal Henry, manager of the Hotel Bonivard in Vevyvaux-Montreux, mid-way between Salvan and Cheiry where 23 other cult members were found dead, said nine of the group met there regularly and dined in a private room there on Friday.

As the hunt for Jouret and Di Mambro was intensified, village children from Salvan laid flowers at the burnt-out chalets where 25 people died. Jouret's presence still haunts the little village as it haunts Cheiry and all of Switzerland. The old lady fetching her loaf from the bakery said: "I pray to God he died with them. If he survived what is to prevent this nightmare happening again somewhere else?"

Final letter admits suicide

By Charles Bremner

THE followers of Luc Jouret's Order of the Solar Temple joyfully killed themselves to escape the wickedness of mankind and the imminent apocalypse and travel to a better world, according to a letter posted to the media on the morning they died.

The letter also accused the Canadian and other authorities of committing the group's "collective murder" by persecuting them.

The letter, addressed to "Lovers of Justice", said: "We have now freed ourselves of a burden which, day by day, was becoming unbearable. It is with an unfathomable Love, an ineffable joy and without any regret that we leave this world."

The 19 printed pages, couched in the jargon of medieval orders, the occult, astrology and environmentalism, were posted in Zurich on the morning after the deaths of Jouret's followers in Switzerland. Investigators said they assume the manifestos were posted by surviving members and noted that they shed no light on the circumstances of the deaths.

Experts said the apocalyptic language, obsession with the environment and persecution and belief in membership of a chosen elite was in keeping with Jouret's doctrine and most other extreme cults.

The letter complains at length about what it calls the persecution of the movement by the Canadian authorities. It ends with a warning: "The race is going irreversibly towards its self-destruction. Nature in its entirety is turning against those who have abused it, corrupted it and profaned it. We will not take part in the annihilation of the human reign..."

Another, 30-page letter typed on a word processor was sent to Jean-François Mayer, a Swiss historian and author of several books on sects.

"ALL GOODS WORTH PRICE CHARGED", is what Jack Daniel's nephew said in 1907. We're still saying it today.

Mr. Lem Motlow put this slogan on crocks and jugs of his uncle's whiskey. You see, he knew our Jack Daniel's Tennessee Whiskey was made with Tennessee cave spring water and mellowed through hard maple charcoal before ageing. Mr. Motlow knew value when he saw it. And still today, though Jack Daniel's is priced above many whiskeys, a sip will prove its worth.

Archbishop speaks out in Turnbull's defence

Bishop's indecency case long gone and forgiven, says Carey

By RUTH GLEDHILL, RELIGION CORRESPONDENT

THE Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr George Carey, yesterday made clear that the Church hierarchy would stand by the Rt Rev Michael Turnbull, Bishop of Durham, who was convicted of an act of gross indecency 26 years ago.

Dr Carey, speaking at a press conference in Bishop Turnbull's former diocese of Rochester, said: "Anything of this nature is something that hurts the Body of Christ, but it is the way we handle it and the act of forgiveness that is great."

The archbishop refused to comment on whether he knew of the conviction before Bishop Turnbull was appointed to the fourth most senior see in the Church of England.

Bishop Turnbull was convicted in 1968 of an act of gross indecency with a Yorkshire farmer while he was chaplain to Lord Coggan, then Archbishop of York. Undercover police were keeping watch on public lavatories in Hull.

Dr Carey, during a visit to the Rochester diocese, said: "Of course it was wrong because we expect high standards from clergy. Michael is a close personal friend. This act was committed 26 years ago when he was a young man. Since then he has gone on to lead a church army and become the Bishop of Rochester and now the Bishop of Durham. He is regarded by the people in this diocese who know him as man of great integrity and honour."

"He has admitted it and it is now long gone and forgiven. Homosexuality is incompatible with the Church of England."

When asked about the Bishop of Durham's sexuality, Dr

Carey said: "I don't want to revisit what was a very painful moment which happened over a quarter of a century ago. Whatever the circumstances he has led an exemplary life for the last 26 years."

Dr Carey insisted there was never a cover-up over the allegations. "There was no intention to do so. Why should we?"

He said Bishop Turnbull's experience would help him to counsel people with similar difficulties. "He would probably deal with it far better than I could. He has been there and would deal with it with great compassion."

"Yes, he did wrong 26 years ago. But should an act committed when he was a young man of 31 stop him becoming the Bishop of Durham 26 years later? The people of this diocese know just how fine a bishop he is. But the deeper issue is about how the church and society in general handles human weakness."

Turnbull: denies he was homosexual

Bishop Turnbull, married with three children, has denied he is or ever has been homosexual.

MP attacks judge over joyrider's 5-year sentence

By GILLIAN BOWDITCH, SCOTLAND CORRESPONDENT

ONE of Scotland's most senior judges came under attack yesterday for being out of touch with reality after he handed down a five-year jail sentence to a joyrider who left a woman critically injured in the snow.

James Graham, 16, appeared before the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Ross, after a hit-and-run accident in a stolen car in Glenrothes, Fife. The victim, Pauline McConnachie, 25, was run down as she cleared snow from her car on Christmas Eve. Her leg was almost severed and had to be amputated.

The sentence was criticised by the victim and by her MP, Henry McLeish, the Shadow Scottish Secretary.

Mr McLeish said: "I am absolutely outraged at the decision by the judge. He has no idea about the damage that has been inflicted on this young lady. Where on earth are these judges living? They are so out of touch with the lives of ordinary people. It seems that permanently damaging someone's life is less important than robbing banks. What has happened to sentencing policy when someone with this record can get the kind of sentence he would get for petty theft?"

The offence was committed while Graham was on bail for another crime. The case was originally heard in Kirkcaldy Sheriff Court where Graham was found guilty of culpable and reckless conduct to the permanent disfigurement and danger of his victim.

He was sent to Edinburgh's High Court for sentencing after Sheriff William Christie decided the maximum three-year sentence his court could impose was not enough. Graham's co-accused, Lee Peattie, 17, who was in the stolen car when the accident happened, was jailed for three months.

Miss McConnachie, who described in court how she saw two smiling youths in a car and thought they were going to splash her, said: "Five years is nothing. No wonder people keep on committing crimes. They know they are going to get away with it."

He may be a successful businessman, but he still likes his Rice Krispies.

What he's not too keen on however, is the breaking-up and fading that occasionally happens with mobile phones.

So he's taken advantage of Cellnet's new digital service.

Digital offers him clearer, sharper calls at no extra cost.

And because it's a rapidly growing world-

A seductive evening dress with cutaway sides by Amanda Wakeley opens British Fashion Week

Ladies who dine come to sparkle

By IAIN R. WEBB

THE first day of shows for British Fashion Week were held yesterday at the Natural History Museum in London. Caroline Charles, Amanda Wakeley and Tomasz Starzewski all offered clothes well suited to their Kensington clientele, who filled the front rows.

Charles showed variations on the over-popular suit — longer and belted, or a neat 1940s silhouette. Skirts were invariably short. The ladies who lunch like to show off their legs. They also like to sparkle, so Charles added clear sequin palettes to powdery soft sweaters.

The audience for Amanda Wakeley's brand of fashion

— who included the actresses Elizabeth Hurley and Twiggy — prefer the designer's minimalist approach. Wakeley cuts sumptuous fabrics such as cashmere, satin and suede into elegant separates. Her evening dresses featuring peek-a-boo flashes revealed a glimpse of flesh. Perfect for Ms Hurley's next outing.

One of Ms Wakeley's most outstandingly seductive creations was an evening dress with trailing fishtail train and cutaway sides, revealing a hint of the body beneath. Other dresses in this section of her show combined shiny satin and mail crpe with a touch of audacity for a modern Naughty Nineties look.

Is Romanticism Dangerous?

A debate about the movement's uses and abuses in German politics

A CORRUPTED utopian socialist state and a disastrous assertion of nationalism — is this Romanticism's political legacy in Germany? How does the uncomfortable debt still influence political life in Germany? A distinguished panel will debate whether it is safe to celebrate Romanticism's pursuit of paradise, or whether it risks running dangerously out of control. The panel includes Irene Dische, the leading German novelist; Norman Stone, historian; Lord Weidenfeld, publisher; Professor Michael Stürmer, German historian; and Anne McElvoy, former Berlin correspondent of The Times. Sinn Fein leader tells film moguls the peace process is 'irreversible and for good'

FROM GILES WHYTELL IN LOS ANGELES

IRELAND'S Troubles and the long path to the current IRA ceasefire would make the perfect subject for a feature film, Gerry Adams, the Sinn Fein president, told Hollywood executives in Los Angeles yesterday.

As his two-week American odyssey came to an end in the world's film-making capital, Mr Adams met some movie stars and was filmed like one. He also deftly adapted his usual speech to include what is known to lapsed film producers as a pitch.

"There's a story to be told about Ireland," Mr Adams declared at a gathering of middle-ranking film industry executives in the fashionable Hancock Park neighbourhood, after being whisked there from his hotel in a white stretch limousine.

"It's an opportunity to be creative and educational and uplifting," he said, warning that, "if someone feels like making it I can tell you he will meet fierce resistance ... in what is supposed to be the mother of democracies."

Clearly aware of Hollywood's unrivalled power to disseminate a point of view through so-called message films such as In The Name Of The Father, Mr Adams said: "You people can do a terrific job of helping us."

He said he was not asking for a specifically Republican treatment of the story of Ireland's troubles. "Come to Ireland and tell what you see. Whatever your view you'll come out with one conclusion, and that is that British rule in Ireland has failed."

Asked for his opinion of In The Name Of The Father, Jim Sheridan's film about Gerry Conlon's wrongful imprisonment for the Guildford pub bombing, Mr Adams steered a diplomatic course, saying: "That was a good film."

Rumours that Oliver Stone, the director of films such as JFK, may be considering a film about Mr Adams's life remained unconfirmed on Thursday night. Mr Adams denied having discussed such a project with anyone. He had an opportunity for such discussions later the same evening, however, when the limousine took him to a party in his honour at the Hollywood Hills residence of the Irish actress Fiona Flanagan.

gan, to which Mr Stone was thought to have been invited. Martin Sheen, Anjelica Huston and the Irish actor Gabriel Byrne were all on a guest list that Mr Adams is sure to add to his ever-growing list of influential West Coast contacts.

Earlier in the day he had addressed a large, mainly student, audience at the University of California at Berkeley, which still basks in its reputation as the birthplace of most post-war student activism. Students cheered when the Sinn Fein leader was introduced as a peacemaker inspired by the likes of Bob Dylan and the Beatles.

"It's my view that the peace process will be irreversible and for good," he said when asked if the phrase "irreversible, and for good" could be applied to the ceasefire as Anthony Lake, President Clinton's national security adviser, had hoped.

Mr Adams refused to state that the ceasefire was permanent but his remark was the closest he has come to such a statement since his round of meetings in Washington earlier in the week.

Gerry Adams in Los Angeles yesterday with Trisha Ziff, a friend. He told Hollywood film-makers there was a tale to be told of Ireland's troubles

Talks may be held before Christmas

IRELAND CORRESPONDENT

GOVERNMENT officials are likely to open talks with Sinn Fein before Christmas, a leading Tory backbencher said yesterday.

Andrew Hunter, chairman of the Conservative Backbench Northern Ireland Committee, said the IRA ceasefire had held for over five weeks, which meant that exploratory talks could begin within the next two months.

The MP for Basingstoke said: "I am very encouraged that the ceasefire is holding. It is far better that people don't kill each other."

The comments by Mr Hunter, who is briefed by officials and ministers, are the strongest hint that the Government believes the IRA ceasefire meets its requirements to allow talks to begin.

If talks are held in December they will follow a formula laid down by Roderic Lyne, Mr Major's foreign affairs adviser, in a letter to Gerry Adams last April. Mr Lyne said a dialogue would explore how Sinn Fein could enter political talks and would examine the "practical consequences of the end to violence", including talks on the handing over of IRA arms.

Short out

Nigel Short is out of the English team in the chess olympiad now fixed for Moscow in December. The event had originally been set for Thessaloniki but the World Chess Federation cancelled the event when Greek organisers failed to confirm that the funds were available.

Garry Kasparov and his Professional Chess Association then stepped in to negotiate the olympiad for Moscow.

Nigel Short's condition for playing in Moscow was that the British Chess Federation should have an official meeting to reconsider the full composition of the team and the captaincy. This the federation has refused to do. The English team now is Michael Adams, Jon Speelman, John Nunn, Tony Miles, Julian Hodgson and David Norwood, with Murray Chandler as captain.

Karpov's KO

Anatoly Karpov won the following dramatic game in the recently concluded mass open tournament in Tilburg, The Netherlands. Black is brought to his knees by an elegant combination starting with the bishop sacrifice 29 Bd7.

East won the first trick with the ace and returned the king to declarer's king. After such ambitious bidding South saw he had to make all five tricks in the heart suit, so the first move was to cross to dummy with a diamond and finesse the jack of hearts.

The contract was still only makeable if East had the king of hearts and West the 10 — with K-10 left. East would have a natural trick — so the only question was: where was the 7?

Declarer played three more rounds of diamonds for which East threw three clubs, ending in dummy. This was the moment of decision: if East had started with K-3 in hearts, a low heart from dummy would win; but if East had started with K-7-3 the queen would have to be led, to pin West's 10.

East was known to have started with one diamond and five clubs, so South had to decide whether his hand pattern was 5-2-1-5 or 4-3-1-5. Reckoning that with five spades East might have over-called one spade rather than two clubs, South led the queen of hearts and made the slam. It wasn't much of a clue, but it was all he had and it was enough.

First radio stations for Christians and women get go-ahead

By ALEXANDRA FREAN
MEDIA CORRESPONDENT

BRITAIN's first Christian radio station and the first radio service catering for women will be on air by the middle of next year.

London Christian Radio, which will be funded by audience donations with the support of Catholic, Protestant and Baptist leaders, and Viva Radio, which is chaired by the PR guru Lynne Franks, who inspired the television series Absolutely Fabulous, were awarded AM licences by the Radio Authority yesterday.

In an unexpected move, the authority also awarded FM licences to two competing rock music stations in London — Richard Branson's Virgin organisation, which already has a national AM licence to broadcast rock-oriented music, and to Crystal FM, part of the Chrysalis media group, which will transmit adult contemporary (AC) music. Capital Radio retained its FM and

Franks: PR guru behind Viva radio

AM licences in the latest London radio franchise round but will face the first ever challenge from Virgin and Crystal, to its 20-year monopoly on the capital's mainstream music radio scene.

Lord Chalfont, 74, chairman of the Radio Authority, denied that Virgin and Crystal would compete directly with each other. Adult contemporary music was far more melodic than rock-oriented music, he said. "I don't profess to be an expert but even I can tell the difference between the two," he added.

Peter Meadows, chief executive of London Christian Radio, said that the station had raised £1.2 million in donations from individual supporters to meet launch costs. In visits to London churches it had recruited 7,000 subscribers, contributing an average of £30 each a year towards running costs.

The station, whose patrons include the Rt Rev David Hope, Bishop of London, and Cardinal Basil Hume, Archbishop of Westminster, will target Christians from all denominations aged over 35.

Viva is intended to be the equivalent of a women's magazine. About 45 per cent of output will be music and the station hopes 25 per cent of its audience will be men.

Ospreys have made a strong recovery in Scotland since their persecution ended

Birds of prey make comeback

OSPREYS and red kites have had their best breeding season for more than a century, the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds said yesterday (John Vincent writes).

The osprey was persecuted to extinction in Scotland, with the last one dying in 1916, but the breed has made a slow recovery since the first pair bred again in 1954. This year a total of 95 pairs raised 146 young, the largest number since records began. Red kites, whose numbers dwindled to only a handful in the 19th century, have also recovered well.

A tiny population in Wales survived and this year's breeding figures — 106 pairs raising 98 young — are the best this century. Reintroduced red kites fared well in England, with 20 pairs producing 37 young, and in Scotland, where eight pairs raised 13 young.

Other rare birds had a mixed season. Numbers of bitterns continued to decline and corn crakes failed to breed in Northern Ireland for the first time.

Church which embraces both humanity and the Holy Spirit

Paul Avis

Dietrich Bonhoeffer, the most gifted of 20th-century theologians, sealed his theology with his life in a Nazi prison nearly 50 years ago. Bonhoeffer completed his first book, The Community of Saints, on the Christian church, in his early twenties. He summed up his argument in the catchphrase: "Christ exists as the Church". This insight, though arresting, was not original.

St Paul, too, calls the church "Christ" — when, speaking of the many limbs and organs that make up the human body, he says "so it is with Christ": his body is the church which is composed of many members (1 Cor 12.12). St Paul and Bonhoeffer, spanning the Christian centuries, invite us to understand the church in the light of Jesus Christ — not always easy.

Our attention is often captured by conflicts and confusions within the church and by the failings and failures of its members.

Christians are still divided at the end of this ecumenical century and the Church of England has just had a great dispute about women priests. Clearly, the church is a human institution with political structures that patently belong to this world. It is both fallible and sinful. Some of its most obvious features are argument, conflict and division and this has always been so, right back to the New Testament. Christians disagree passionately among themselves because God has not revealed how the fundamental unchanging principles of the faith are to be translated to meet the challenges of a constantly developing historical context.

It would be idolatry to identify the church with Jesus Christ absolutely. Christ and the church are in tension. The relationship is dialectical — a dialectic of identity and distance, solidarity and judgment, unity and criticism. The church is, at one and the same time, both a divinely ordained society and a human institution. Christians cannot give up on the faith-dimension of the church.

In the Apostles' Creed the Holy Spirit is the ultimate ground of the church: "I believe in the Holy Spirit, the communion of saints... Yet we must never use this ultimate grounding in the Holy Spirit to justify all that is done in the name of the church. The church is compelled to undertake a continual critical evaluation of its fellowship with Christ."

While the media, perhaps inevitably, tends to focus on the shortcomings of the church as a human institution, millions of our fellow citizens draw strength to live a better life and to cope with adversity from their participation in the worship and fellowship of the churches.

They will continue to be grateful to the media for responsible criticism of ecclesiastical failures but they will not thank the media when criticism passes into debunking and makes it harder for the faithful to discern the reflection of Jesus Christ in the face of the church.

Bonhoeffer saw that some form of the church — that is, Christians gathered in community to worship, witness and services — belongs to the very essence of Christianity. In the little book Life Together, which he wrote for the training of pastors in the German Confessing Church, which resisted Nazism, Bonhoeffer insisted: "Christianity means community through Jesus Christ and in Jesus Christ... No Christian community is more or less than this... we belong to one another only through and in Jesus Christ."

Prebendary Dr Paul Avis is vicar of Stoke Canon, Potters Bar, Herts. He has written Polymorphous with Huxham and Rewe with Netherex, Exeter.

Police chief says officers abuse early retirement

BY RICHARD FORD, HOME CORRESPONDENT

POLICE officers have been accused by a Chief Constable of retiring on medical grounds to win bigger pensions.

Since the beginning of last year more than 60 per cent of the 154 retirements from the Nottinghamshire force have been for health reasons, Dan Crompton, the Chief Constable, said.

In other forces the figure is as high as 70 per cent, causing concern at the Home Office.

Mr Crompton gave a warning that further increases in retirements on medical grounds could lead to cuts in overtime payments and manpower levels. "There are many deserving cases for medical retirement but it is my firm view that others have milked the system for personal financial advantage."

"All they are doing is taking advantage of the rules, some might say. Could any organisation withstand medical retirements rates of this order? The answer is no."

He told Police Review: "If we were a private company we would have been bankrupt long ago."

Mr Crompton said one of the weaknesses of the system was that an officer who was fit to work in a control room would then be asked to move to operational duties. "Then one invariably sees the search for medical retirement. I call that an abuse of the system."

There is alarm over the strain on budgets caused by medical retirement. Research for the Home Office has shown that more than half of all retiring police officers leave the service early on medical grounds. Such retirements rose fourfold in ten years and accounted for 36 per cent of officers retiring.

Trefor Morris, Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary, said in his annual report last year that the high percentage of retirements on health grounds would "place increasing strain on pensions budgets and may require a change in the rules governing medical retirements."

Officially, the increase is blamed on dangers of policing, with 22,000 injuries to officers a year. But a Police Federation survey among junior ranks found many officers believed bullies abused the system to escape from a stressful job.

Mr Crompton's statement was rejected by the Nottinghamshire branch of the Police Federation. Dave Wheelodon, the secretary, wrote to the Chief Constable demanding evidence to support his claim that the system was being abused.

Mr Wheelodon said there were rigid procedures for securing retirement on medical grounds.

The police pension is payable after 25 years' service if the officer is 50 or after 30 years if under 50. It becomes index-linked at 55. Early medical retirement gives an officer a full pension.

Andrew Pacey broke down in tears as he spoke: "We just can't believe what has happened. Anybody who knew her would tell you she was a lovely person"

Family 'ruined' by Julie Pacey's murder

Husband in tears as he appeals to wife's killer

BY LUCY BERRINGTON

THE husband of murder victim Julie Pacey wept uncontrollably yesterday as he made an emotional appeal for the killer to give himself up. Andrew Pacey, 39, said: "If he just saw what he has done to our family, he would come forward."

"It's affected everything in our lives. It has ruined everything, all our plans. We just can't believe what has happened. It's just Julie. She was so lovely. Anybody who knew her would tell you she was a lovely person... wonderful."

Helen Pacey, 14, who returned from school on September 26 to find her mother's body in the bathroom of their Grantham home, was taken to hospital on Thursday night suffering suspected appendicitis. She had been kept in hospital overnight for observation.

Mr Pacey said Helen and her brother, Matthew, 11, had not coped particularly well since the murder. "Helen has been very upset and quiet. Matthew has been speaking more but is still very upset at nights, obviously. We're just getting through each day at a time. Everyone is pulling together though the future will be very difficult."

The police are trying to establish a motive for the killing. Mrs Pacey had suffered a serious sexual assault and had been strangled but there were no signs of a break-in or struggle.

Det Supt Roger Billingsley of Lincolnshire Police said it was possible she had been too frightened to resist. He said there was no evidence Mrs Pacey knew her killer.

The police are still trying to trace a man who called at the house three days before the murder. Mrs Pacey had told her daughter on September 23 that she had been upstairs when she heard someone at the front door and called out "come in". She went downstairs to find a stranger in her hallway. He asked for directions and left. The man was about 35, white, overweight, 5ft 8in tall. He wore blue overalls and boots.

The police are also trying to trace the owner of a metallic blue BMW or similar car, seen heading into the driveway, next to Mrs Pacey's Audi, at about 3pm on the day of the murder.

Gerbils have taken over shredding duties at Tobermory

Gerbils sink teeth into police secrets

BY GILLIAN BOWDITCH, SCOTLAND CORRESPONDENT

WHEN cutbacks meant police on the island of Mull could not have a shredding machine, they recruited a pair of gerbils to do the job.

Until recently, confidential papers were burnt on the Inner Hebridean island's rubbish tip. Then Strathclyde Police vetoed burning as a method of disposing of the documents.

When a request for a shredding machine for the two-man police station at Tobermory was turned down, Sergeant Malcolm McGookin bought two gerbils, Otto and Shredder. The rodents shred the paper to make bedding, filling the large glass fish tank in which they live once a week.

PC Daniel Armour, who is based at Tobermory, said: "They are very efficient. They can get through three or four sheets in an afternoon. They shred police reports and other documents that you can't just put in the bin. They are a joy to watch."

Right now, there are some very concerned criminals out there reading this. Their chances of getting away again and again with crimes could be greatly reduced.

It depends on all of us.

The Police need more help from the public to fight crime. 62% of all solved cases are thanks to public co-operation.

After all, the Police can't be everywhere at once. But together with your neighbours, you can.

That's why we've brought out this booklet, 'Partners Against Crime'. It tells you how you can help reduce crime, in partnership with the Police.

Most people, after all, report crimes if they see them happening.

But it's when crimes are less obvious that many people will sometimes turn a blind eye.

To a man loitering outside a neighbour's house, for instance. Or to a newly broken window.

You may see something, but are scared of making a mistake, so you pretend you haven't seen.

But it's a bigger mistake to let a possible crime go unreported.

So, if you ever see anything suspicious, don't hesitate to call the Police.

The booklet also tells you about some more active ways you can help.

Joining Neighbourhood Watch, for instance, which has reduced crime in some areas by 75%.

And there are also two new partnerships, Street Watch and Neighbourhood Constables.

They are designed to meet the various needs of various neighbourhoods.

Both involve you and your local Police. Your help will be vital. Crime only thrives if we let it.

Criminals would prefer you not to send for this booklet. So please send, or phone, for it now.

Prescott unveils plan for one member, one recruit

By JILL SHERMAN, POLITICAL CORRESPONDENT

JOHN Prescott launched a new drive to boost membership to 500,000 by the next general election as he urged the conference to rally behind Tony Blair and "stop speaking the language of the past".

In a passionate and rousing end-of-conference speech, which earned him a long standing ovation, the deputy leader called on the party's 300,000 members to recruit one person each to help build a mass membership party and "put politics back in touch with the people".

tion of Labour's basic socialist principles. Mr Prescott said Labour had learnt its lessons and was "on the road to government".

Mr Blair was building on John Smith's legacy of integrity and honesty and had given the people a new confidence in Labour, he said. He was a leader with the courage to lead and the party owed it to the people to win the next election. "Once again we are Labour with ambition. Labour with confidence. Labour to be proud of," said Mr Prescott. "Our ambition is for the people who so desperately cry out for a change of government. Our confidence is for the potential of a country liberated from Tory waste, corruption and sleaze."

"Our pride will be the honesty and integrity and decency of a Labour government. It has taken far too long to achieve."

But he warned against complacency, arguing that the party could win the next election only by convincing voters that Labour could make the difference. "Never underestimate the capacity of the Tories to lie and cheat their way to government. We will not win the election by default. We will win it through the force of our ideas and the strength of our argument."

The new statement on the party's constitution would offer the chance to "ignite the public with an enthusiasm for our beliefs," said Mr Prescott, as he reassured the Left that the party would not be abandoning its fundamental beliefs.

Brushing aside Mr Blair's defeat on Clause 4 on Thursday, Mr Prescott said nobody should fear debate. "We will reaffirm the principles of decency and justice that are the core of those beliefs," said Mr Prescott. "Our constitution will stand as the rock of our socialist convictions for the next century."

The party had to defend public services such as the railways and the Post Office, he said. "As Tony said on Tuesday, we believe in public ownership. It is an essential and fundamental part of our socialist faith that we believe in as a Labour party. It is at the heart of our philosophy."

He called on everyone in the party to play their part. "It's a

Prescott: his passionate speech managed to combine support for the party's new direction and old values massive task. It's a crusade. We have to win back the trust that the Tories have squandered."

Underlining the need for more representation of women, he said prejudice had to be dispelled both inside and outside the party. "Let's stop speaking the language of the past and start practising the politics of the future," he said. Earlier, in a vicious and witty onslaught on the Tories, Mr Prescott said the conference had "served a notice to quit on the most desperate, despicable, seedy, grubby, hopeless, lying, hideously incompetent bunch of third-rate double-dealing disasters this nation has ever seen".

Later, Larry Whitty, the party's outgoing general secretary, urged the party not to turn its back on the trade unions, as it emerged that the NEC was to draw up new rules to reduce the voting strength of unions at conferences. "Remember that in progress in life and in politics you have to take the people with you. Always remember that the trade union base of this party is its greatest strength and not its weakness," he said.

Blair blitzkrieg leaves friends and enemies shell-shocked

By PHILIP WEBSTER, POLITICAL EDITOR

Tony Blair could have done without Thursday's defeat over Clause Four. But few would deny that he had a stunningly successful week at Blackpool.

If the Conservatives show little sign yet of coming to terms with the phenomenon that is the Labour leader, that could also be said of many of his leadership colleagues.

Mr Blair is moving at a pace that is staggering, even frightening, some senior party figures. The reaction of the few who were let in on his historic announcement on Clause Four ranged from delight to horror. Shock was the abiding emotion. He was going to do it, and he was going to tell conference that he was doing it. It was brave, reckless, or both. One Labour votes and yesterday's headlines would have proclaimed that the Blair revolution had been carried out in two days.

Perhaps that would have been too smooth. Mr Blair will need, and get, a little trouble on the way to prove to the country that he has changed his party for good.

His biggest tasks lie ahead, when he returns to the cold reality of Westminster. Key among them will be sharpening and developing his policies to match the rhetoric of change. But Mr Blair wants to cut back on the reams of policy papers flowing through the party machine. A much tighter system of policy preparation will be introduced. With Shadow Cabinet elections imminent, Mr Blair wants to bring on new talent, but much depends on the hand he is dealt by the electorate of MPs. At one point it seemed likely that Robin Cook would become shadow Foreign Secretary to replace Jack Cunningham. But Mr Cook angered some in the leadership by what was seen as a less than supportive response over Clause Four, and his chances have subsided. One candidate being canvassed for that job is George Robertson, the shadow Scottish Secretary. Jack Straw is at the top of many lists to replace Mr Blair as shadow Home Secretary.

There is also pressure from John Prescott — along with Mr Blair the undoubted star of this week's events in the Winter Gardens — to take on a senior post. Some would like to see him shadowing Michael Howard. The success of the Blair-Prescott axis, with Mr Blair leading from the front and Mr Prescott reassuring the faithful, is regarded by all Labour insiders as a central advance.

Mr Blair has to press home the advantage on Clause Four. He has a one-page draft replacement in his back pocket. It will go to the national executive in December and then go out to consultation. Mr Blair is determined to have an agreement sewn up early next year.

“The Blair team may have taken their eye off the ball. All energies should have been devoted to Clause Four”

Jack Cunningham's successor as shadow Foreign Secretary now seems unlikely to be Robin Cook

Law Society: 'limit to how long we can work increasingly long hours for no profit'

Solicitors accuse Tories of sinister plan to cut legal aid cash

Frances Gibb, the Times legal correspondent named newspaper journalist of the year by the Bar Council this week, reports from the Law Society's conference

THE Government was accused yesterday of a "sinister agenda" to limit the cash available for legal aid with its proposals to create GP-style fundholders who will grant legal aid.

Charles Elly, president of the Law Society, which represents solicitors in England and Wales, told the society's annual conference in London that legal aid had to remain as a demand-led system.

Government proposals to set up fundholders were not about restraining growth in spending: "It's altogether more sinister: it is to fix arbitrary limits on the budget."

He said that one reason for the rising legal aid bill, expected to reach £1.6 billion by 1996, was the Government's own policies. Measures to curb a suspect's unfettered right to silence would cost more money, because more solicitors would be called to police stations at night and there would be more arguments in court over whether a suspect's refusal to answer questions should be held against them. "This will mean longer trials and more money," Mr Elly said.

He accepted the need for some controls on legal aid, but said this should be done by reducing the legal aid costs for each case rather than cash-limiting the total funds available, or by creating "fundholders", which would be a new bureaucratic tier.

Solicitors were working increasingly long hours for hourly rates under the legal aid scheme that were "no longer sustainable", he added.

For two years there had been no rise in hourly rates and earlier this year the fixed rates of pay in civil cases had meant in some parts of the country a reduction in fees of about one-third. "This cannot go on. We have shown clearly over many years our willingness, as a profession, to provide legal services for members of the public by carrying out work at little or no profit, and I suspect on many occasions at a loss."

There was a limit to how long solicitors could do this and that limit was being reached, he said.

Mr Elly also attacked government proposals for "emasculating" the scheme of compensation for crime victims and replacing it with a tariff that would "drastically cut awards to the most seriously injured victims".

The proposals had been rejected in the House of Lords and in a few weeks the House of Commons would be voting. "Do MPs realise that under this plan, the award to a young person unable to work for life as a result of a criminal attack could be cut by around 80 per cent?"

The Law Society is to urge MPs to adopt an alternative under which smaller awards could be handled on a tariff system but larger awards could still be dealt with on a discretionary basis.

Judges, part of a legal system that encourages time-wasting, should allocate blocks of time for speeches by counsel and questioning of witnesses

President demands time limits on civil hearings for justice 'people can afford'

By Frances Gibb, legal correspondent

Charles Elly: "disputes could be settled by phone"

JUSTICE "people can afford" could be introduced by imposing time limits on civil trials and settling small disputes by telephone, the president of the Law Society yesterday.

Charles Elly told some 800 solicitors at their annual conference in London that costs in civil justice were too high and the way the courts were run was too expensive.

"Go into any court any day of the week," he said. "Squeeze past clients and lawyers crammed in corridors trying to reach settlements."

"If you are lucky enough to find a trial in session, you may find counsel solemnly reading out loud documents and cases as if the judge had not already had a chance to read them and did not have copies in front of him."

Mr Elly, who is head of the 70,000 solicitors' profession in England and Wales, said that advocacy was about putting an argument persuasively and succinctly. He added: "More often it is about leaving no stone unturned. No question, however remotely relevant, is left unasked. No argument however fanciful is unexplored."

The only way to stop all this was to set fixed time limits on the length of civil trials, he said. This would cut costs both for the litigants in the case and for all other litigants whose cases would then start on time.

If advocates in the US could present a brief to the Supreme Court in 30 minutes, they could do the same here.

Mr Elly suggested later at a press conference that judges should allocate blocks of time for speeches by counsel and their questioning of witnesses and in that way, calculate a time limit for the case as a whole.

If barristers failed to meet their deadlines, there would be no extensions. "If you can't get out your point in the time allotted, you've missed it."

Mr Elly said. For the smaller claims of under £1,000, particularly those consumer disputes over shoddy goods and services, Mr Elly outlined a novel "judging by telephone" arbitration scheme.

Solicitors, adept at negotiation and settlement, could play a key role as arbitrators, settling disputes without the need for a court hearing.

The county courts were becoming "increasingly uneconomic", he said. Instead, under this cheap arbitration service, solicitors could phone people at their home or work, if they needed to clarify the facts and then reach swift authoritative decisions "which would carry confidence in local communities".

He said: "This truly would enable us to bring justice to the people at a price they can afford."

£43 million mortgage fraud man gets 5 years

A businessman was jailed for five years yesterday for a £43 million mortgage fraud that deprived hundreds of investors of life savings.

Oxford Crown Court was told that Roy Wharton, 61, chairman of Castlegate Group Holdings and Castlegate Securities, Reading, made a fortune leading investors' money for second mortgages. But as the property recession of the late 1980s began to bite into profits, he began lending large amounts of the investors' money to borrowers who were unable to pay him back.

Wharton, of Yateley, Hampshire, was found guilty of two sample charges of fraudulent trading.

The court hearings will set an important precedent. Most follow-up books to old best-sellers, such as Gone With the Wind, have been published with the permission of the literary estate of the author. The case depends on the familiarity of the reader with the original. German lawyers argue that though millions "know" Dr Zhivago, few have read the book.

The sex war will not be enough to split up the "grand coalition" government. Nor will it scratch away too many voters from Herr Haider. Plainly, however, one of Europe's most chauvinistic states is changing quickly.

The former monarch's promise was not good enough for the edgy former communists who run Romania and fear that his return could unite a fractious opposition around the royal family. A car was waiting for the former King when his flight from Paris landed to drive him to a Romanian airline plane a short distance away. He refused the offer, however, and said he would rather return on the Air France flight that had brought him to Bucharest.

Fears over Anglicised Europe revive dream of the nation state

French identity crisis fuels new drive for la gloire

FROM CHARLES BREMNER
IN PARIS

A DOZEN senior civil servants from the Nordic countries trooped this week through the august Left Bank portals of the ENA, the nursery of France's governing elite, and started conjugating "Je suis, tu es..."

The new Eurocrats' language course at the Ecole Nationale de l'Administration is another rear-guard action by a country agonising over its waning clout in Europe and the world at large. Paris think-tanks may jeer at the spectacle of Britain in decline, but episodes over the past month have underlined the feeling, often unfounded, that the "French model" in everything from government to cuisine, is under mortal threat from an ungrateful, American-influenced world.

"The arrival of the new members risks swinging the majority [in the European Union] towards English," Alain Lamassoure, the Minister for European Affairs, said after the Nordic fonctionnaires came to the ENA. The onslaught of English is a factor in the anxiety over the potential emergence of a

■ Anxiety is growing that the "French model" in everything from government to cuisine is at risk in an ungrateful world

Union that is no longer a France writ large but which amounts to a German-led trade-zone supported by Britain. The recent call by Edouard Balladur, the Prime Minister, for an inner Franco-German core was a response to the fear of ebbing power.

Seen from Paris, the French model of centralised state management, born in the 17th century, is under siege on all fronts, not least at home. From what opponents call the "neo-liberal dogma" as well as the crisis of the state-subsidised cinema and collapse of the linguistic Maginot Line, witness this week's offensive in the European Court, led by Britain, to block the 20 billion franc (£2.5 billion) subsidy that M. Balladur has promised the effectively bankrupt Air France. While Paris is defying Brussels over competition on air routes, ministers are also fighting to keep out Japanese car imports.

On another front, France expects the European Court to embarrass it by siding with Muslim girls who are being expelled from school for defying a new ban on head-covering in the classroom. For liberal commentators, the Muslim affair symbolises the fragile state of le modèle français. Despite its tradition of secular education, a nation as strong as France should be able to tolerate minorities, they say.

M. Balladur is, however, irritated by such talk. "You have to understand that French civilisation is a civilisation of uniformity while the Anglo-Saxon one is based on diversity," he tells British questioners. The public, according to polls, strongly agrees with him.

France's clouded image in the world was at the heart of the outrage from the media and human rights groups yesterday over the government's refusal to allow Taslima Nasreen, the Bangladeshi writer, to visit the country for more than 24 hours. The government backed down, after the critics lamented the impression that a country which proclaimed itself the world champion of secular liberty should flinch from welcoming a victim of Muslim extremism.

The "Anglo-Saxon" model has been brandished with a vengeance over the past week by media pundits abhorring the eruption of corruption cases across the political and business world. Le Monde even published a gushing article depicting the integrity of British public life as a shining example for France. Restoring the glory of l'exception française, as General de Gaulle called it, has become a priority in the presidential campaign. Both the Gaullist premier and Jacques Chirac, his main rival, are promising to make France a great power again.

They are, however, running headlong into a contradiction. Both acknowledge privately that even with the end of recession, the only way to cure the chronic unemployment is to cut the high taxes and rigid labour laws that keep people out of work. At the same time they are vowing to preserve the generous "social guarantees" born in an age of protectionism. Trying to outdo his colleague, M. Chirac is promising a return to "Social-Gaullism". This is code for a stronger welfare state and an implied retreat from open-market thinking.

The paradox has landed M. Balladur on a collision course with France's youth, of which one in four is out of work. After more than 1.5 million took up his call for "dialogue" and wrote to him of their despair, he promised this week to come up with measures but he will be hard put to avoid disappointing them.

Many thinkers of right and left now want a return to a full-blown nation state. The capitalist jungle, they argue, is bringing misery. France should boast the merits of a system which has created a generous welfare state, a successful state-run car maker, the world's most advanced railways and which has been the driving force in the Airbus, the Ariane rocket and the Channel Tunnel.

Recent governments have sold out, said Le Monde Diplomatique in a blistering attack this week on the decay of French grandeur. "Everything shows that we have abandoned our singular political project, in which the state and the citizen offered the world an original model of civilisation," it said. "One after the other, the great French traditions in the economy, social relations, national cohesion, defence, foreign policy and culture have been neglected, dismantled and forgotten."

German's gaffe aids anti-EU Finns

FROM WOLFGANG MÜNCHAU
IN HELSINKI

ONLY days before Finland goes to the polls to decide whether to join the European Union, the anti-Brussels campaign in Helsinki has received an unexpected boost. Klaus Hänsch, the German president of the European Parliament, said in a recent interview that if Finland voted no, it would come back to the European Union years later, cap in hand.

His remark, in the run-up to the Finnish referendum on EU membership on October 16, was used by the anti-Union campaign to good effect: for it touches on the most basic Finnish anxiety about the Union: fear of bullying.

Despite Herr Hänsch's efforts, however, Finns appear to be edging closer towards EU membership, according to the latest opinion polls. Pro-Union campaigners throughout Scandinavia hope that a yes vote would have a domino effect on Sweden and Norway, which are also applying for membership. The outcome in Sweden will be close, but most Scandinavians think that the battle to persuade Norway to join may already be lost.

Herr Hänsch may not be the most gifted of diplomats, but his remark is probably true, since Finland is on its knees economically, and seems resigned to accepting that it can do little about it. During the 1991-93 recession, Finland's economic output fell by 14 per cent; unemployment rose from 3 per cent to 20 per cent; the budget bloated, as did the deficit and the public debt. Having previously been in the economic league of Germany and Luxembourg, Finland suddenly found itself in the economic neighbourhood of Belgium and Italy.

Proponents hope that membership of the EU will release badly needed investment into the economy. By joining Europe's monetary hard core — which the Finnish economic establishment sees as the prize of joining — the country hopes to flatten its economic cycle.

UN peacekeepers force Bosnian troops to withdraw

FROM TIM JUDAH IN BELGRADE

IN AN action unprecedented in the present Balkan troubles, United Nations "blue helmets" have driven 550 Bosnian government troops out of the demilitarised zone south of Sarajevo and blown up their bunkers and trenches.

The move came after UN troops discovered 16 dead Serb soldiers and four nurses who had been killed by Bosnian forces on Thursday.

Initial reports said that the bodies of the dead Serbs had been mutilated, but UN sources retracted that charge yesterday. Lieutenant-Colonel Jacques Lechevallier said that the first UN troops had arrived on the scene an hour after the action "and had had a terrible impression". Four sentries had their throats cut, but, considering the need for silence during that type of commando raid, UN sources said such action was normal.

The UN troops found six survivors of the attack, including a woman nurse. Afterwards Radovan Karadzic, the Bosnian Serb leader, threatened to expel UN forces from his self-declared republic saying that they were "not treating us equally with the Muslims and Croats".

Despite the threats, it appeared that the Bosnian Serbs were reacting cautiously. A key indicator was that flights into Sarajevo airport, which had been closed for 15 days, resumed yesterday. Just before the deaths the UN had secured guarantees from the Serbs for the reopening.

In Brussels, Nato ambassadors decided to ask Boutros Boutros Ghali, the UN Secretary-General, to support swift airstrikes against a wider choice of targets if Bosnian Serbs attack peacekeepers or violate safe areas. The tougher airstrike policy, sought especially by the United States and outlined at a meeting of alliance defence ministers in Seville last week, would require a speeding up of response procedures.

The demilitarised zone around Sarajevo was created in August last year after a triumphant Serb advance that drove Bosnian forces out of the areas of Trnovo and most of Mount Igman and Mount Bjelasnica. The mountains overlook the Bosnian capital and the Bosnians have carved a road across Mount Igman that serves as their only supply route to the city.

As Serb forces moved to cut the Igman route, the UN and Nato stepped in and threatened to bomb the Serbs if they did not withdraw. They did pull back on condition that the area they left in the care of the UN was demilitarised. Since then they have complained constantly that Bosnian forces have encroached on the zone.

In Belgrade, in the meantime, officials fear that the international Contact Group of Russia, Britain, France, Germany and the United States is preparing to offer President Milosevic of Serbia an agonising choice: in exchange for recognising the borders of Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina, sanctions will be lifted. On Wednesday sanctions were eased, but the trade and oil embargo remains in place.

Speaking in New York, Vladislav Jovanovic, Foreign Minister of the rump Yugoslavia, said that the Bosnian Serbs would most likely accept the present peace plan if sanctions against his country were ended. He added, however, that the government in Belgrade would recognise Bosnia and Croatia's borders "only after they had been recognised by all nations living in their territories".

American sex survey uncovers hotbed of marital bliss

BY JAMES BONE

A NEW study of the sex lives of Americans has found they are less promiscuous than previously thought, and married couples are the happiest in bed. The study was the first to rely on random sampling rather than volunteers, who might skew results. Researchers interviewed 3,432 men and women between 18 and 59. The survey suggests that a third of Americans have sex at least twice a week, another third a few times a month, and one-third only a few times a year or not at all. Only 23 per cent of single men and women who live alone reported having sex at least twice a week, while 41 per cent of married couples did. Unmarried couples living together reported the highest rate of sex, with 56 per cent saying they have intercourse at least twice a week. The median number of sexual partners in a lifetime is six per man and two per woman. One man reported 1,016 partners and one woman 1,009.

Haiti slum poverty shocks American police force chief

FROM TOM RHODES IN PORT-AU-PRINCE

SECURITY is tight at the Villa St Louis, the Port-au-Prince hotel that serves as command centre for Ray Kelly, the former New York city police commissioner with perhaps the most unenviable task in Haiti.

Armed soldiers guard the entrance night and day, occasionally motioning to a bucket at their side where anyone carrying a weapon must remove the clip and fire a blank chamber. Inside are the force of international police monitors who arrived this week to oversee the delicate mission of suspending, then selectively destroying, and finally recreating the local police force in a country where tradition has dictated that invariably the cops are simultaneously the robbers.

It is clearly a challenge for Mr Kelly, who was to be found eating a hurried dinner before being flown by helicopter to a American ship with a direct videophone link to the Oval Office. He had been hand-picked by President Clinton for the Haitian operation and the two men are said to meet regularly. They are both aware that if the Kelly mission fails, American troops inevitably will become the new Haitian police force, a role that proved disastrous during the last United States occupation in 1915 and one which the Pentagon has ruled out.

In between mouthfuls of burnt chicken and rice, Mr Kelly, small but powerfully built, appeared tense as one of his lieutenants told him of plans to send a monitoring force to Cap-Haitien, the country's second city. "We mustn't send too many. They [the Haitians] must not feel overwhelmed. It is all about trust," he said. Trust is a rare enough commodity in Haiti. In the demoralised police force, it is all but lost.

When Mr Kelly arrived at the police headquarters in Port-au-Prince earlier this week the reception had been very cool. Lieutenant-Colonel Joseph Michel François, the hated chief of police, had just fled the country and his successor, a surly police major, rejected any suggestion of joint patrols between the international monitors and his own men. It took nearly four hours of diplomacy before Mr Kelly personally accompanied a Haitian lieutenant on the first such patrols through one of the poorest districts. He has patrolled some of the worst precincts in New York and had tours in Vietnam and Korea, but nothing had prepared the former US Marine colonel for what he saw in the Haitian slums. "I have never witnessed poverty like I have seen here," he said.

Whether he has the ability to transform the Haitian police remains to be seen. His team of 1,000 international police monitors, along with a separate but parallel United Nations observer trainer force, must keep the Haitian authority intact long enough to prevent a vacuum.

Aristide spurned personal luxury

FROM IAN BRODIE IN WASHINGTON

JEAN-BERTRAND Aristide, who has vowed to return to Haiti's presidential palace by next Saturday, spent millions of dollars on lobbyists and his government-in-exile during three years in Washington, but lavished little on personal luxuries.

Under an order signed by George Bush, the former US President, Mr Aristide was granted free access to funds in Haitian accounts that were collected and held by the US Treasury under the sanctions imposed on Haiti after the military coup.

By the middle of last month, $90 million (£57.7 million) had been put into the frozen fund, including money from aircraft landing fees and international phone calls that American firms would normally have paid to the Haitian government.

Of this, $50.4 million was withdrawn by Mr Aristide. All he had to do for the money to be made available was to send a lawyer to the Treasury Department and request routine approval from the State Department. Washington did not impose any requirements on how the funds were to be spent. Officials say they are satisfied, however, that the millions were not squandered away for Mr Aristide's personal benefit.

According to 'What Car?' his next car won't be a Ford.

"What Car?" tested the security systems of 50 cars. Only 7 kept "thieves" from towing them away within five minutes.

Three of the cars that passed were Fords: the Fiesta, the Escort and the Mondeo.

The Mondeo was the "hands down winner". In fact, in the opinion of the testers "professional thieves won't bother".

In other words, thieves know exactly what car to go for. Which is worrying...unless, of course, you drive a Ford.

Everything we do is driven by you.

FROM ROGER BOYES IN BONN

HELMUT Kohl, the German Chancellor, predicted confidently yesterday that he would still be ruling his country in 1998 and did not exclude a further term of office that would take him into the next millennium.

The Chancellor, having completed a round of election rallies and survived egg-throwers and hecklers, was in ebullient mood as he gave his last big press conference before the general elections on October 16. The opinion polls bear out his confidence, apart from the weak link of his coalition partner, the Free Democrats. An opinion poll conducted by the Forsa institute said that the Chancellor's Christian Democrats were leading the Social Democrats by 9 percentage points, enough for an absolute majority.

The emphasis of yesterday's conference — a pre-election ritual since he took office in 1982 — was thus rather on what Herr Kohl plans to do after winning yet again. "Thank you for these questions about my future term of office since they assume that I am set for victory," he boomed.

The opposition claims that the Chancellor is getting ready to leave office halfway through the next term, in 1996, when he breaks Konrad Adenauer's record of 14 years in power. The Chancellor brushed aside that charge. "I do not wake up every morning and think how long have I got before I break Adenauer's record. I love life too much for that."

He dodged questions about his intention in 1998 when the next legislative period runs out, but hinted that he might still be in contention. His main priority, he said, was to round off his two principal missions: consolidating German unity and pushing forward European integration.

His comments — dismissed as misguided and perverse optimism by the Social Democrats — raised the question of the possible heirs to the 64-year-old leader.

Rivals have been consistently squashed by the Chancellor during the past 12 years and the only man who now comes close to the status of crown prince is Wolfgang Schäuble, the parliamentary leader of the Christian Democrats.

That would mean a change in emphasis rather than direction: Herr Schäuble is both more nationalist than Herr Kohl and more determined to create a "hard-core" of European states.

The accession of Herr Schäuble, a cold, clever strategic thinker who was crippled in a political assassination attempt in 1990, would not, however, solve the problem within the Christian Democratic Union.

The crushing of rivals by Herr Kohl means the party is now fixated on the Chancellor: it has lost its traditional identity as a catch-all party for market liberals, Christian socialists, businessmen, nationalists and European integrationists.

Younger ministers mentioned as potential successors, such as Matthias Wissman, 45, the Transport Minister, are committed to only one strand of the party and will find it difficult to keep the Christian Democrats intact, let alone lead it.

□ EU enlargement: Herr Kohl said yesterday that the European Union should set a timetable for membership of Eastern European countries at its inter-governmental conference in 1996.

The Chancellor said the meeting would be the moment of truth "when our neighbouring countries must know that they are wanted. No later than that point a timetable should be drawn up for enlargement," he said, adding that Germany's frontier with Poland could not be allowed to remain the EU's eastern border. (Reuters)

Zhirinovskiy boycotts Duma

FROM RICHARD BEESTON IN MOSCOW

VLADIMIR Zhirinovskiy, the nationalist firebrand, yesterday attempted to paralyse the country's political system when he stormed out of parliament with his supporters over a dispute with President Yeltsin.

In a move intended to hijack the new session of the Duma, the leader of the Liberal Democratic Party said he was suspending his participation in the chamber in protest at what he claimed was a campaign of victimisation by the Kremlin. "Our party is being persecuted, stifled and repressed everywhere," Mr Zhirinovskiy said. He added that he was also withdrawing from the Kremlin's Civic Accord treaty, which he signed earlier this year. The LDP's action was supported by the Agrarian Party. Together, the two parties represent more than 100 deputies. If they sustain their boycott, they could seriously hamper the passing of 200 new items of legislation now before the 450-seat assembly.

The discrimination issue came to a head on Monday when a plane carrying Mr Zhirinovskiy to North Korea was refused permission to land in the western Siberian town of Kemerovo. The local authorities claimed the runway was under repairs, but Mr Zhirinovskiy insisted that the move was part of an orchestrated plot against him.

Yeltsin regrets Irish 'mix-up'

FROM REUTERS IN MOSCOW

PRESIDENT Yeltsin of Russia apologised yesterday to Albert Reynolds, the Irish Prime Minister, for a diplomatic gaffe at Shannon airport and said it was all due to an "annoying mix-up".

Mr Reynolds was kept waiting on the runway last Friday when the Russian leader failed to appear during his stopover on the flight back to Moscow from Washington. His place was taken by Oleg Soskovets, a Deputy Prime Minister. In a letter to Mr Reynolds, the text of which was issued by Mr Yeltsin's office, the Kremlin leader said: "I sincerely regret that our meeting at Shannon did not take place because of an annoying mix-up."

However, the letter, dated October 7, did not offer any further explanation, although it included an invitation to Mr Reynolds to visit Russia. Official explanations have ranged from him being unwell or too tired after a summit meeting in Washington to a mix-up on board the plane that led to bodyguards not waking him. Earlier this week a Communist deputy in the Russian parliament linked the incident to what he claimed was Mr Yeltsin's fondness for drink.

Viktor Ilyukhin, the chairman of the Duma's security committee, said that President Yeltsin was an alcoholic and called for his health to be investigated by an independent commission.

US joins Britain in backing Saudi economic reform

BY MICHAEL BINYON, DIPLOMATIC EDITOR

THE United States yesterday joined Britain in publicly supporting Saudi Arabia after the Clinton Administration insisted that American investments in the kingdom were secure despite the huge Saudi budget deficit.

Lloyd Bentsen, the US Treasury Secretary, told businessmen at the end of a two-day visit to Jeddah that King Fahd had promised to cut spending and reduce the deficit. He said after meeting the King that he was "very impressed" with the monarch's commitment to privatisation.

"I came away with the firm belief that investments here are secure, and that the Saudis are interested in additional investment," he said.

Mr Bentsen did not discuss liquidity problems with Saudi officials, however, according to the Saudi Press Agency. The Saudi government, still struggling to pay for the Gulf War, has proposed a cut of almost 20 per cent in the budget. But it has not announced any plans for an income tax or any curb on the high spending of many of the royal princes.

America and Britain are worried that Saudi retrenchment may affect their huge exports to the kingdom which, after Hong Kong, is Britain's

Satellite plan is opposed

Washington: A bipartisan group of 64 American senators said yesterday that they opposed granting an export licence for a Saudi Earth station for an oil exploration satellite, to be launched in 1997, because they feared it could be used against Israel. (Reuters)

Khalil, the Oil Minister, said afterwards that Saudi Arabia was committed to "adjusting to new economic realities".

King Fahd has accepted an invitation to visit the United States, but no date has been set. Washington is said to be nervous about the recent arrests in Saudi Arabia and the increasingly vociferous opposition of dissident exiles. The State Department said last week that America had "serious concerns about human rights in Saudi Arabia".

King Fahd, in his seventies and not in robust health, does not have a clear successor. Until recently it was evident that he would be succeeded by his younger brother Abdallah, another of the many sons of Abdul Aziz Ibn-Saud, the founder of the kingdom. But the decree setting up the new consultative council made it clear that Prince Abdallah will only be a caretaker pending confirmation by the ruling family and other senior religious figures.

The pressure is now increasing on the royal family not only to curb the extravagance of the princes and take steps against senior members accused of corruption but to settle the succession question now by picking someone from the next generation.

Despite nervousness in the West about the long-term future of the present system, Western analysts said that any pressure in Washington or elsewhere on the Saudis to pick a reforming liberal would be counter-productive.

Dame Joan Sutherland, the opera singer, speaking in support of the monarchy in Sydney. "I am a very ardent supporter of the monarchy and I can't imagine not having our wonderful allegiance to our heritage, to our Queen and to our right to have this wonderful, wonderful on-going connection with home."

Diva upsets republicans said Dame Joan, who lives in Switzerland. Her defence of the monarchy drew a rebuff from Paul Keating, the Prime Minister, who wants to turn Australia into a republic. As an expatriate, he said, she cannot be expected to have "contemporary views of Australia". Dame Joan, 67, also enraged non-British immigrant groups by complaining that she often had to deal with Australian government officials of Chinese or Indian origin when renewing her passport. (AP)

Abiola rejects offer of bail

BY EVE-ANN PRENTICE, DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENT

MOSHOO Abiola, the Nigerian opposition leader on trial for treason, has vowed to die in jail rather than accept an offer of bail in exchange for dropping his claim to the presidency, his lawyer says.

Chief Abiola, who is presumed to have won annulled presidential elections in June last year, was seized after declaring himself President on the first anniversary of the poll on June 12. However, widespread unrest and strikes that followed his arrest have abated and his claim to the leadership is believed to be running out of steam. Any deal to win bail could end his ambitions, observers said yesterday.

Chief Abiola, 57, is reported to be in poor health and now faces a long stay in prison after the federal high court of appeal in Kaduna adjourned indefinitely rulings on whether to free him on bail and on the competence of the special federal high court set up to try him in the federal capital, Abuja.

"Many people inside and outside the country see him as not fit to be President," Ahmed Rajab, editor of Africa Analysis, said. "That is why there has not been more internal or international pressure on his behalf. They are suspicious of the way he did business."

Japanese finalise ten-year budget

FROM REUTERS IN TOKYO

JAPAN yesterday finalised plans to spend $6.30 trillion (£4 trillion) in the decade starting April 1995 on public works projects, but left open the thorny question of how to fund the sum.

The debate fuelled fears that the ambitious programme, which aims to shore up an economy just recovering from a severe recession and to provide for Japan's ageing population, would worsen the shaky state finances.

The new plan, endorsed by the Cabinet, would replace a $4.30 trillion spending plan being implemented over the ten years from 1991-2. "Given weak tax revenues, Japan cannot help issue more government bonds, which may darken the budgetary picture," Kazuaki Kiri-shima, an economist said. Japan hopes the new spending will also cut its vast current account surplus. "I expect the plan to lead to a meaningful cut in Japan's surplus and boost domestic demand," Ryutaro Hashimoto, the Trade Minister, said.

Germany reclaims its past

Anne McElvoy on Chancellor Kohl's appeal to the emotions

Chancellor Kohl's private office in Bonn is an unremarkable modern building with wide, modern windows overlooking the Rhine. In the distance he can see the elegant ruins of the medieval Hambacher Castle, where in 1832, at the height of the Romantic period, the student associations of the quarrelsome principalities first vowed internal strife and vowed to create a unified and free Germany.

Few visitors escape without hearing a treatise on the majesty of the Rhine and how it symbolises continuity in a history marked by abrupt breaks and lurches. One British visitor looked up in the middle of such a speech to see the Chancellor unselfconsciously wiping away large tears.

It is impossible to contemplate this scene without being reminded of the influence of German Romanticism on the politics of the Federal Republic. Helmut Kohl's emotional reaction to the Rhine, or the Castle or the German flag would be unthinkable without the background of that movement. Its emphasis on personal feelings in political life, on history as the alembic of present action and on ideas not expressible within the confines of the rationalist tradition are all personified in Kohl.

With the general election now only a week away, Germany must choose whether to carry on with the Chancellor they know or to take a chance on the uncharismatic challenger, Rudolf Scharping of the Social Democratic Party. Scharping's main election poster shows him alone. Kohl's poster, by contrast, shows him in a crowd which is pressing in on him. He is affable and relaxed. The message is that he is at one with his people, and the Chancellor is confident that this sense of belonging will carry him through a difficult vote.

Even his supporters agree that Kohl is a stolid pragmatist, a wily party manager and string-puller, rather than a charismatic leader. Admitting that he is hardly an exceptional character, his latest biographer makes a desperate comparison: "After all... John Major is no more urbane or interesting than Helmut Kohl." Kohl's success is usually explained in terms of his ability to sit out crises, his sense of timing and his finger-in-the-wind decision-making. But he is also skilled in the handling of sentiment and the use of symbolism to feed the hunger in the soul of his people for such emotions — however much they pretend to be rationalist sophisticates.

"He is a man who thinks not in the categories of abstract logic, but analogously — in pictures," wrote Der Spiegel's chief Kohl-watcher, Jürgen Liebmann, back in 1992. This is exactly right, but most Germans prefer not to acknowledge it. The influence of Romanticism and associated national sentiment in politics has been denied since the war. Any suggestion that irrational influences, which were so disastrously perverted in National Socialism, still operate at the heart of German democracy causes near-panic. Hence the infantile jokes about Kohl which scorn him as a bumbling idiot. After three terms in power and the diplomatic coup de théâtre which secured the unity of the nation, it is abundantly clear that Kohl is very far from an imbecile; but the jokes go on (eight books of them are currently on sale) because his critics would rather not face up to what really makes people vote for "Pear-head".

Kohl instinctively knows how to exploit the continuities as well as the caesurae in German history. He is, above all, a Wilhelminian figure — mixing national pathos, sentimentality and stiltedness — and, despite the pretence that 1945 represented a complete cultural break, Germany still has traces of its Wilhelminian past, particularly in the countryside and small towns, and in the east. Even the former Communists of the Democratic Socialist Party, his sworn enemies, have tacitly accepted this, as evinced by their caricature of Kohl as Kaiser Bill — an attempt to show him striving to revive a dangerous Grossmacht.

But his ability to act as a bridge between the Germany of the first unification and that of the second has a little acknowledged appeal to voters at a time of uncertainty about Germany's identity. In his private as well as his public life, Kohl embraces the Romantic tradition. Holidays are spent rambling near the Wolfgangsee in Austria, a traditional pilgrimage for nature lovers.

He enjoys the idea of the German state as an extended family: ever before 1989 he used to refer to the German "Fatherland" and call the East Germans "our brothers and sisters". On his travels around the country, his aides carry large home-cured sausages, ready for his snack-attacks. The Chancellor takes out his pocket-knife, cuts the sausage into chunks and ceremoniously hands it out to his companions. "These are his happiest moments," says a sometime participant at these simple feasts.

With his love of home and hearth, Kohl often tips over into the realms of Romanticism's wan offspring, the Biedermeier period. His promise to the East of "blooming landscapes" had about it the winning quality of bad pastoral poetry. Chancellor Kohl must know that his fate at this election is more uncertain than ever before, and that 14 years in office is a mixed blessing. Goethe, in his old age, castigated the fickle nature of success in his poem, "The Years":

A charming crowd, I would say,
Bring me gifts tomorrow to match yours yesterday...
Then all of a sudden change their mind
No longer oblige, no longer are of the kind.
Won't give you gifts, won't let you borrow.
Take from you today, rob you tomorrow.

But as Kohl concludes his wanderings through the unified nation's marketplaces and beerhalls, he does not look like a man unduly bothered by the pessimism of such poetry. Is Romanticism Dangerous? See page 6.

Margot Norman says institutionalising ever-younger children will not produce better citizens

Nursery can't make up for bad parents

Is John Major really planning to pull a £680 million rabbit out of the hat at next week's party conference, in the shape of a programme for universal nursery education? The rumour mill is that this is the magic trick that he is planning, and expectations among the nursery education lobby — a broad one these days, taking in a fair swath of industry and commerce — are rising feverishly.

Last Christmas they heard him talk enthusiastically of redeeming Margaret Thatcher's 22-year-old promise of nursery education for all, and since then they have seen the education department officials scurrying about collecting data and advice on implementing such a programme.

The Royal Society of Arts did much of the work for them by gathering together experts and interested parties and producing a comprehensive report, entitled Start Right, last spring. Its author, Sir Christopher Ball, who made an eloquent case in this newspaper on Monday, regards nursery schooling for three to five-year-olds as a social priority in the class of clean water, vaccination and free elections.

Naturally if you see it like that you won't ask whether it is affordable. The question is, how many people — and more particularly, how many of the Tory faithful — do see nursery schooling as an unduckable priority worth more than half a billion of public funds? No doubt they accept that it is a vote-winner with the electorate at large, but are they in their hearts convinced that it is either necessary or even a Good Thing?

In short, is the early institutionalisation of children who ought to be at home with their mothers, venturing out occasionally to a nice little playgroup run by volunteers, really the sort of thing that the party of the family should be mixed up with? And anyway, hasn't the research on the effects of all this been a bit equivocal?

Perhaps the nearest response to the doubters is to quote Jean Ensor, a former school inspector, who says that what nursery education provides in a society like ours is what the Third World takes for granted. Three-year-olds don't need nursery schools when they have grandmothers, aunts and uncles to take them into the fields and show them the meaning of work, order and respect, the boundaries of safety, danger and anti-social behaviour, and even how to develop the limbs God gave them.

Things have changed so rapidly in this country that thousands upon thousands of small children now receive almost none of this early education at home. They have social contact with one single, isolated adult who with the best will in the world is an inadequate role-model. They are not even taken to run about in the park any more, because parks are seen as unsafe places. They arrive at school barely able to talk, and in the sort of physical condition you would expect of a child whose only chance to run about has been in a supermarket aisle.

Trying to distinguish between "care" and "education" is fatuous with this age group, which is partly why the current division of responsibility between departments of education and social services is pernicious. If you are poor, you can only get your child into a nursery school by beating it hard enough and often enough to attract the attention of social services. We are not talking about teaching children the three Rs from the age of three, we are talking about rearranging our institutions and priorities so that they can develop normally in this peculiar new society.

Like young animals, young children need the opportunity to acquire basic physical and social skills at given ages and stages: missing the boat means problems later, sometimes much later. Research bears this out, most convincingly in the case of the American High Scope programme, which has followed two large groups of poor, inner-city children (one nursery-schooled, the other not) through into adulthood and discovered a "pay-back" for the cost of nursery schooling that gets larger with every year. In terms of crime, unemployment and other expensive manifestations of not getting on very well in life, that pay-back amounts by the age of 27 to more than $7 for every dollar invested.

Continentalers have always seen the point of nursery education, and they have also seen another point which the Royal Society of Arts report grasps firmly. Why is Britain out of step with all of Europe, and indeed with most of the world, in starting compulsory schooling at five instead of six, or even seven? Our children have an extra year of full-time education, and yet their results are demonstrably worse. So what are we doing wrong? Missing out on part-time nursery education, that's what.

The French started their system of écoles maternelles in the last century, and the Germans invented the idea of the kindergarten. It is striking that even in Germany, where mothers cleave to Kinder and Küche and far fewer go out to work than here, the goal is to have nursery places for all by 1998. So why aren't we just stepping into line and putting the money that could be saved by raising the starting age in six towards meeting the needs of three to five-year-olds?

Why should others bail out Lloyd's names who took a gamble too far?

The scene on the Law Courts' steps last week was that well-known photo-call for British justice, a plaintiff "jumping for joy". The law had shown neither fear nor favour; the rich were as entitled to its protection as the poor. Michael Deeny had won his case against the Lloyd's Gooda Walker agency on behalf of over 3,000 names. Owing to the proven negligence of their agents, they can try to recoup more than £500 million in losses on hurricane and maritime claims in the late 1980s. It was the biggest civil action in legal history. Mr Deeny was scathing about Lloyd's in his moment of triumph: "I thought I was joining something safe and conservative... Lloyd's is the only casino in the world where after you walk out they follow you and try to take your house away."

They do indeed. I imagine I was approached by Lloyd's in much the same way as Mr Deeny. The encounter was casual — it was in a train — and the man was straight-forward and not pushy. He passed the time of day, ascertained my profession and volunteered his. He then asked, "Have you ever thought of joining Lloyd's?" I recall that verb well. I knew others who had "joined". Some even implied that an unseen hand had "put us into Lloyd's", as if a rich uncle had just died. Their wives would murmur at dinner about this "adorable little cheque" that arrived each year about school fees time.

Part of the thrill of being a Lloyd's name was that shiver of excitement. "Of course we could lose everything," they say they can take you down to the last collar-stud. "It was share-free gambling because the unlimited liability was what Mr Deeny called 'a quaint tradition'." Nobody was ever asked for collateral. Lloyd's vetting committee was stern. You had to "show" £50,000 (my day), excluding the family home. But a bank guarantee would do, and nobody asked what the bank might take as collateral.

By the end of our journey, my new friend was glowing with the benefits of membership. I felt like Tamino at the gates of Zarastro's castle. I had only to play the magic flute and easy money was mine. But the old wisdom held me back: if a man in a pub offers you a "dead cert" at Newmarket, first ask why? Human nature is not given to gratuitous generosity. Free lunches presage costly dinners.

I think Mr Justice Phillips was kind to Mr Deeny and his friends. He found that Gooda Walker had been run "negligently" in failing to honour their "implied contractual duty of care". They had not adequately reinsured the four syndicates hit by Piper Alpha, Hurricane Hugo and Exxon Valdez. There was no question of fraud or dishonesty, nor did the names claim it. The judge simply agreed with them that Gooda Walker had "gambled recklessly with the names' homes and the names' businesses". So they could keep their houses and collar-studs after all.

So who pays for the storm damage and the hurricanes, not to mention the billions more of suits likely to be settled out of court? Lloyd's might like to regard this as victims' negligence. As with signatures on a Trojan debt, the liabilities will go slithering back round the insurance market. But who really pays, so that 3,000 Lloyd's names do not have to sell their houses? Insurers will argue that in a "fiercely competitive" market these extra losses will not be passed on to the public in premiums. Profit-margins will be squeezed. Foreign corporations will be hit. Little of this reinsurance affects the personal market. I wonder, whatever else an underwriter may squeeze, it is rarely a margin. Lloyd's is indeed a casino where they try to take your house. If it fails to get your house, it must find someone else's.

Gooda Walker names took not one risk but two. They put their entire wealth at the disposal of a highly specialised and dangerous part of the world insurance market: catastrophe insurance involving unlimited liability. Premium income flowed into this business without those supplying the assets having to lift a finger. The only price was, or should have been, the "quaint tradition" of liability.

The second risk was no less wild. It was to place this first risk with what we had better call a most distinctive group of gentlemen. They were dashing characters, not natural wearers of seat-belts. They underwrote risks that defied assessment or adjustment. They rode roller-coasters such as long-tail, stop-loss, time-and-distance. But Gooda Walker's mavericks had a ride to end all rides. It was the "LMAX spiral", concentrating on catastrophe. It had names queuing to join.

The insurance market's beginnings in an 18th-century coffee-house, as drawn by David Gentlemen.

This was not a flutter on the Derby. It was not even the top table at the Claremont. Lloyd's names were betting on the behaviour of the planet, on hurricanes and earthquakes, on asbestos, radiation and oil pollution. With a big enough premium, they would have bet against the end of the world. With whom did they place their bets? With the most reckless corner of an institution that had already lobbied its exclusion from the Financial Services Act and won self-regulation in an act of its own (in 1982). This exclusion was described in the House of Lords as "a privilege unequalled in the world of commerce". One lady pleaded last week, "I didn't know it was my job to hang over my member's agent. I don't do that to my bank manager." She did not ask her bank manager to gamble her net wealth each day.

I carry no brief for Gooda Walker, Outhwaite, Feltrim or the rest of them. I am sorry for those names who have suffered hardship. But when they shout "negligence" at those who danced with them down this merry road, I cough politely and look the other way. The business was so chancy that the word negligence is inappropriate. Should the reinsurance have been higher? That would have hurt the profit. How can you be careful when determined to walk across a field in which a nuclear mine has been planted? Never was a gambler so warned of his possible debt: "Liable down to the last collar-stud." Some 17,000 Lloyd's gamblers are now suing their agents for £35 billion of relief from liability. More than £100 million is reportedly being laid out on lawyers' fees. Why should the rest of the world have its premiums, or the price of goods and services, used to let them off the hook?

Last spring, the governors of Lloyd's offered the names a take-it-or-leave-it £900 million for hardship, on condition that they accept their contractual liabilities. The money came from the Central Fund, which was intended for use in cases where names failed to pay and policyholders were left without cover. In other words, the fund was for customers in difficulty, not for names in difficulty. The Gooda Walker names refused the offer, and went to court. They now have satisfaction, although how much money they will actually get depends on how much reinsurance the Gooda Walker and similar agencies have against claims of this kind. All that the names have now proved is that Lloyd's liability can after all be limited, provided you pour a libation to the Goddess Negligence, and can pass the buck to someone else.

I find the Lloyd's saga extraordinary. Seizable people who would never go near a betting shop, a dog track or the Monte Carlo casino were seized by a collective madness. In the mid-1980s, more than 30,000 members of the British middle classes hurled themselves into a turn of the South Sea Bubble and the Great Crash. They fell under the spell of Martingale and invited the ruin of their generation. Now they are selling their estates, their houses, their pictures, their boats. It is a redistribution of bourgeois property to lift the heart of a socialist.

Perhaps this is just the British way of revolution. Perhaps it always has been.

Hurd instinct

THE PRINCESS of Wales has turned for advice to one of the most experienced hands in the diplomacy business. She has been recently spotted in the Foreign Office, where she had a meeting with Douglas Hurd.

The subject of their discussion remains unclear. Neither the Foreign Office nor Buckingham Palace will give any indication of what was said but they confirm that the meeting took place. There have been suggestions, however, that Hurd was offering avuncular advice about James Hewitt's sordid claims.

Few are better qualified to help than the tweedy Old Etonian. Hurd has undergone a divorce himself, and the diplomatic expertise of a man who gained Margaret Thatcher's respect even after nailing his colours to Edward Heath's mast cannot be doubted. He has survived in Cabinet for more than a decade and claims to be an avowed supporter of all things British.

"The true answer to why I am a Conservative is not political at all," he once said. "All my life has been formed by the institutions of this country and, because I think them admirable, I believe they should be preserved."

The former treasurer of the Tory party, Lord McAlpine, offered a warning: "Why take advice from a politician? It seems that the Church has more to do with this matter." A

DO YOU THINK THEY'D HAVE JEREMY HANLEY?

Foreign Office source suggested that future foreign trips might also have been discussed. "She wanted to come in and talk about this and that. He's a pretty seasoned Cabinet minister and there was a general discussion."

● No one will be more dismayed at the recent cancellation of the Pope's visit to New York than street vendors hoping to cash in. Papal ephemera such as "Pope on a Rope" soap and "Let Us Spray" lawn sprinklers will, they fear, prove difficult to shift.

Frozen out

INSIGHT into the royal family can be gleaned from A Mingled Measure, the latest volume of diaries written by James Lees-Milne, an aesthete regarded by Alan Clark as the best diarist of the century. He recalls the dinner in 1972 at Rules restaurant in Covent Garden after the premiere of a John Bejman film on Australia: the Prince of Wales and Princess Margaret joined him at the table.

"I hardly spoke a word to the Royals, but watched them closely. Prince Charles is very charming, and very polite, shook hands with us all and smiled. PM is far from charming, is cross, exacting, too sophisticated and sharp. She is physically attractive in a bun-like way, with trussed up bosom, and hair like two cottage loaves, one balancing on the other... She smoked continuously and did not talk to John [Bejman] once."

Low achiever

ANYONE wondering why Michael Heseltine has not yet made it to Number 10 need only turn to a book by his former sports coach at Shrewsbury, Michael Charlesworth. His memoirs, Behind the Headlines, include details of Heseltine's abortive attempt to win the school athletics crown. Charlesworth, now retired, remembers Heseltine as "someone who never quite got to the top of any particular ladder. He was not stupid or without ability. He just couldn't reach the top."

The high jump, it appears, was his speciality, and Charlesworth coached him eagerly. "He represented the school at the end of term. Then, at the last moment, the football captain came and defeated him. He was rather deflated."

Saunders: tart remark

Nonetheless, the practice served him well. He later became Minister for Aerospace.

YESTERDAY'S exhibition of jive on the platform by John Prescott and his wife Pauline outshone that of Tony and Cherie Blair, who performed their dance at Labour's Scottish evening last Monday. It was a clumsy slow waltz: ballroom enthusiasts described it as a nervous shuffle.

Tony's tap-dancing namesake, Lionel Blair, offers his services: "I would love to give him lessons — it would be The Two Blairs. Just don't expect me to take my clothes off, like Cherie Blair's assistant." ● Presenting awards for British Fashion Week at the Natural History Museum on Thursday night was Jennifer Saunders — and she wouldn't have given clothes designer Jeff Banks any prizes for style. "Is that a serviette you're wearing?" she inquired of the fluffly white towel he was flapping like a towel around his neck.

LESSON FROM JAPAN

Japan is rebuilding itself, but not just through state spending

The Japanese government announced plans yesterday to spend 630 trillion yen, equivalent to roughly £4,000 billion or eight times Britain's entire gross domestic product, on transport investment, information super-highways, new housing, cultural centres and other public works projects.

The purpose, according to the government, is not only to mollify the Clinton Administration which has been demanding ever more extravagant measures to reduce the imbalance in trade between the two countries, but also to change the lives of the Japanese. The long-term ambition is nothing less than to transform Japan by the early 21st century from a mere economic powerhouse into a "lifestyle superpower".

Among Western observers the instinctive response to such grandiose declarations is cynicism. Even before they get round to sniggering about the quaint concept of a "lifestyle superpower", American economists and politicians are sceptically combing their way through the figures, noting that they include too little in the way of "new money" from the government.

The £4,000 billion will be spent over ten years and therefore amounts to an annual expenditure of only £400 billion, or 15 per cent of Japan's GDP. And much of this investment will be undertaken and financed by the private sector, rather than the State. Furthermore, the new investment programme, covering the ten years to March 2005, replaces another launched in 1991 that sounded almost as spectacularly ambitious — and another before that. All this investment did not prevent Japan from sinking into its deepest recession in the post-war period, nor avert the ugly trade skirmishes and currency crises which have dominated Japan's relations with America.

Neither have the pharisaic-sounding public works announced by successive Japanese governments apparently done much to improve the lot of the average Japanese salaryman. He still lives in a house that is small by international standards, travels to work in appalling congestion, works very long hours, enjoys few holidays and is denied some of the most basic physical amenities which Westerners take for granted. The statistics show, for example, that only 44 per cent of Japanese houses are connected to mains sewerage and on average they are 20 per cent smaller than in Europe. Residents of Tokyo have access to only 2.5 square metres of open space per capita, compared with 30 square metres in London and 19 square metres in New York.

But Western statistical bean-counters are probably missing the point when it comes to Japan's plans for public investment and social transformation. To counteract the West's jaded quips about "workaholics living in rabbit hutchies", the Japanese can cite some astonishingly impressive social statistics, say on crime, education, health, culture or pollution. More importantly, the West should not underestimate Japan's sense of purpose once it arrives at its celebrated consensus on some new national goal — nor its ability to achieve national objectives by galvanising private enterprise, instead of just relying on government.

Americans and Europeans laugh at their peril about strange-sounding phrases like "lifestyle superpower" and "softomics" (the Japanese term for what they believe will be the economics of the future, based not on physical output, but on the creation of intellectual products, or "software" in the broadest sense). The Japanese have well understood the need to rebuild their economic and social institutions, as well as their physical infrastructure, to adapt to the electronic age. And they seem to know how to do this without destroying their social fabric or allowing an uncontrolled expansion of the public sector, which remains far smaller than it is in Europe and comparable in size to that of the US.

Instead of titrating about Japan's extravagant promises and odd-sounding rhetoric, the West should study its system of partnership between the public and private sectors as closely as it studies Japanese manufacturing techniques.

SOCIETY AND SOLICITORS

The legal profession struggles to keep pace with change

Members of the Law Society are in unhappy mood as they gather in London for their annual conference. Discontented with their shrinking takings (90 per cent of solicitors, it is said, earn less than does an average GP), they are expected to give a torrid time to their new president, Charles Elly. Since Mr Elly is not to blame, they would do well to look instead at ways in which they might become more competitive.

As members of a monopolistic profession, and as essential purveyors of legal services to the public, it would be wrong of solicitors to expect the Law Society to acquire the contours of a trade union. Of course the society possesses a certain dimension of the guild; but its primary character — which some argue should be its only character — is that of a self-regulatory body.

The main object of the society is to ensure that the profession is manned by practitioners of integrity and professional skill. The rules of the society complement those of the 1974 Solicitors Act and regulate the keeping of accounts, advertisement, insurance and disciplinary procedures. In doing so, the society discharges an important public duty: it acts, effectively, as an ethical watchdog and in the consumer interests of the litigant. Mr Elly has sought to turn the annual conference to his advantage by stressing that any loss of focus here would only harm the wider interests of the profession as a whole. His words deserve quotation: "The challenge for me as President is to find the right ways to serve both the profession and the public. I reject entirely the notion that we should retreat into an exclusive self-serving pressure group."

Those solicitors who espouse the "trade union" approach to their society's functions do so largely for financial reasons. The decision in April by Lord Mackay of Clashfern, the Lord Chancellor, to impose drastic cuts in the budget for legal aid has hit the high street solicitor hard. Yet few have shown the initiative to reduce costs. The profession has largely failed to accept that the Lord Chancellor had no option but to confront the problem of soaring bills. The legal aid bill to the taxpayer for this year alone is set to reach £1.4 billion.

A prolonged recession has led to a drop in income for solicitors from sources such as conveyancing. Moreover, the decision by the Government to end the century-old monopoly which solicitors enjoyed, but from which the consumer emerged second-best, has never been accepted by the profession's rank and file. In fact, there is even an element which yearns for a return to the Dark Ages when there was a fixed-scale fee for conveyancing and solicitors were disciplined if they charged less.

The Law Society has now to grapple with the crucial matter of its own trajectory. It cannot protect the public effectively and act as a trade union at the same time. There is an inherent tension between the two roles. Its president has grasped this point: it is time for the majority of its members to do so too.

END OF A CAMPAIGN

Oxford's fundraising success is a model to other universities

When Oxford launched its fundraising initiative in 1988, it was said that the nation's oldest university was luring younger institutions of higher education on to ground on which Oxford would always win. Today, it is clear that Oxford has done its young rivals a considerable favour. The achievements of the Campaign for Oxford, which ended last week, have shown how quickly private funds chase success. The ancient universities have an obvious advantage in this respect: as long as they live up to their reputation as centres of excellence, they will continue to attract generous support from outside. But that does not mean that other institutions cannot compete.

Dr Henry Drucker, who directed the Campaign for Oxford for five years, deserves praise for the aggressive pragmatism with which it was conducted. When an initial target of £220 million was suggested, many in the university were deeply scornful. That target was eventually raised to £340 million, and has now been exceeded. More than 100 academic posts have been created as a result of the campaign, including more than 30 professorships. An exercise that was first ridiculed as a surrender to Thatcherite doctrine has, in practice, enriched Oxford life forever.

Two lessons emerge from this spectacular success. First, universities must cast their net widely. The campaign received more than 1,000 donations from sponsors who were not alumni of the university. Some will have given money to Oxford for reasons of social cachet. Most, however, will have sent their cheques rather more sincerely, because they believed in the projects they were backing.

Secondly, university campaigns benefit from specific targets. In the last six years, for example, the Institute for American Studies and the Institute for European Studies have been supported passionately by small groups of dons and outside patrons. Both projects will continue to benefit from the planned university development programme, which will continue the work of the campaign after its conclusion. By selecting clear objectives, the campaign's organisers ensured that its work was not wasted.

Heresy quickly becomes orthodoxy in educational circles, as elsewhere. When the campaign was launched, it remained a dictum of higher education that the only legitimate form of provision was state provision. Now, it is widely accepted that university funding requires a mixed economy, in which the private sector plays a significant role as the taxpayer. Nottingham University, for instance, raises more than £60 million a year from private business; it has a thriving alumni association. The London School of Economics has hired a new fundraising team. Bristol University persists with its own campaign. Institutions which have long assumed that the State will provide are now broadening their horizons. It is essential that they take heart from Oxford's success and see it as an inspiration, not an exception.

From Mr Michael Ivens

Sir, Discussion at the Labour Party conference on a minimum wage, as you pointed out in your leader ("Maximum wage", October 4), repressed any consideration of its likelihood to increase unemployment, inflation and prices.

Mr Blair's desire to avoid mentioning any specific figure for a minimum wage, which he states would be introduced "sensitively and flexibly", is a further attempt to bury the discussion until after the general election. It conflicts with Mr Blair's accompanying statement that "those most in need of hope deserve the truth".

The impact of such a policy in the UK is likely to be particularly damaging to the young. Studies by Professor Walter Williams, of the George Mason University, Virginia, show that minimum wage policies have been particularly damaging to the young, black and educationally unqualified, who are rejected for employment if the employer finds the wage rate unrealistic.

And of course, a minimum wage would be just a jumping-off point for trade unions whose members are in work.

Yours faithfully,
MICHAEL IVENS,
49 Ordance Hill, NW8,
October 5.

From Mr Victor Serebriakoff

Sir, Many of the longest-term unemployed lack training, skills or learning ability. Others are old, handicapped or have a bad record. They are seen as less productive and/or more difficult by a prospective employer. Only at lower wages can they be employed economically.

A wages "floor" already exists in effect: it is the sum of benefits a claimant can get while unemployed. The present level of "minimum wages" is the level above that floor, such that the claimant will gain enough by working. His or her hope of employment is the offer of a job above that minimum level which nevertheless makes it economic for the employer.

A government-enforced minimum would certainly be higher than that marginal level. It would raise the threshold of ability required to justify it and thus cut off a section of the unemployed from the chance of work. The higher the minimum the bigger the slice of the long-term unemployed who would lose the chance of work.

Yours etc,
VICTOR SEREBRIAKOFF,
Flat One,

October 4.

From Dr Valerie Goldberg

Sir, Within the lifetime of many of your readers £4 a week was a sufficient wage for a man to support a family in comfort. Doesn't a series of governments which has brought us to the state where a wage of £4 an hour is considered the minimum necessary deserve condemnation?

Yours faithfully,
VALERIE GOLDBERG,

From Mr Malcolm R. Arthurs

Sir, In response to David Adams's report of October 3, "Marines keep Haiti food rioters at bay", I can confirm through Don DeHart that two ships did arrive at Cap-Haitien with UN food. It has however, been taken straight to warehouses and locked up, with no word how or when it will be distributed to the unfortunate victims of a three-year trade embargo. Can one expect anything other than riots and looting?

The partly British-funded relief operation, For Haiti with Love, and its leader, Don DeHart, have remained in Haiti when virtually all other organisations pulled out at the beginning of the embargo. In that three-year period the cost of running the organisation has been sustained at black market prices. Sanctions have been lifted, but nothing will change until Aristide is back in the country; the Port au Prince International Airport is "open for commercial traffic" but the first plane will not be cleared for landing until at least October 12. Announcements are being made, but nothing has changed for the poor.

Yours etc,

Contested views on organic farming

From Mr Gordon Angell

Sir, Your report (October 4) on organic farming contains several misconceptions current among enthusiasts for "natural" methods. In effect organic produce receives the same level of support as conventionally farmed food.

A long-term programme being introduced throughout the European Union to encourage environmentally beneficial farming provides extra subsidies to make this method viable. In July the Ministry of Agriculture announced a scheme specifically to subsidise farmers converting to organic production.

Nitrates in animal manure are exactly the same as those in chemical produced fertilisers and cause considerable pollution: ask the Dutch about their pig manure "mountains".

People who claim to be concerned with welfare seem prepared to allow animals to suffer discomfort and even pain from parasites and disease because they are against the use of modern preventives.

Mr Jonathan Dimbleby claimed that the present farm subsidies of £2.7 billion would cover the cost of converting the whole of Britain to "an environmentally sensitive area". This does not, I think, take account of the huge adverse effect on our balance of payments for importing food we could no longer grow because of loss of productivity under organic methods.

Yours etc,
GORDON ANGELL

(Chairman, British Agrochemicals Association, 1983-84), Rendlesham, School Lane,
Langham, nr Colchester, Essex,
October 5.

From Mr Jules N. Pretty

Sir, You are right to point (leading article, "The greening of Gummer", October 4) to the beginnings of historic changes in Britain's farming and rural landscape. Farmers increasingly realise that a more sustainable agriculture, with integrated technologies for pest, soil and nutrient management, can be as profitable as "modern" practices needing heavy doses of fertilisers and pesticides and large featureless fields.

Environmentalists, too, increasingly appreciate that farmers are the best stewards of the countryside and that their own interests will best be served by working in partnership with the farming lobby. Never have apparently implacably opposed interests come this close.

But these changes do not go far enough. Evidence emerging from many Third World countries indicates that the transition to a more sustainable agriculture can be accompanied by wider economic and social benefits. It has done so in countries as widely dispersed as Honduras, Kenya and India, where communities have been encouraged to participate in local decisions. It has done so where there has been the local and national political will to support these emerging opportunities.

This is the challenge for the Secretaries of State for Environment and Agriculture. Britain lags far behind many Third World countries with respect to changes in farming and the environment and so has much to learn. It does, however, have the opportunity to show much needed leadership here in Europe to support the transition to sustainability.

Mr Gummer should do more than support just organic agriculture for a month, in the latest promotion of food produced in this way. He and Mr Waldegrave should start by declaring a national policy for sustainable agriculture and rural development, and so seek to transform European policy as well as the British landscape.

Yours faithfully,
JULES N. PRETTY (Director, Sustainable Agriculture Programme), International Institute for Environment and Development,
3 Endsleigh Street, WCI.

From Mr Neil Datson

Sir, Farmers are well used to lurid hype about modern agricultural practice. However, any link between conventional farming and cruelty, reflected in your report and leading article, is a slur. Livestock farmers in the UK cannot be said to be cruel to their animals, as they just will not respond economically.

There are different perceptions of good animal welfare, some better researched and more valid than others. For example, the minimum weaning age for piglets stipulated by organic standards, six weeks, would cause enormous welfare problems for sows if imposed on all pig farms in the country.

Yours faithfully,
NEIL DATSON,

Survival at sea

From Lieutenant-Commander
Raymond V. Coleman, MRN, RNR

Sir, One cannot expect ships' passengers to become adept in sea survival skills (Lieutenant-Commander A. Clifford's letter, October 5). That is the duty of the crew.

Survivors of the Estonia tell of the struggling crowds seeking to escape the ship and, when in the water, of masses clambering on to upturned inflated life rafts and of those inside eventually perishing of hypothermia.

As a specialist yacht navigation tutor, may I offer two suggestions. First, that crew, who are traditionally cabinied in segregated crew quarters, should be accommodated evenly throughout the ship. This would enable them, as much as is humanly possible, to take charge of groups of passengers, guiding them to the several escape routes. Secondly, that crew, especially non-seaman staff, should be trained in life-raft handling.

Yacht masters under training receive a one-day sea survival course, with special emphasis on life-raft righting — a simple quick procedure, even in rough seas — and in hypothermia prevention etc.

Such courses immeasurably aid survival chances; but of course it requires the crew to be in the right place at the right time. Hence the need to re-think crew accommodation as well as training.

Yours truly,
RAYMOND COLEMAN,
Coleman Yacht Navigation,
4 Old Garden Court, Mount Pleasant,

From the Reverend Roy Greenwood

Sir, During the Peace it has not been unheard of for some members of our congregation who have been at variance with one another to approach each other to make peace again — thereby coming to the Communion in love and forgiveness.

Yours peacefully,
ROY GREENWOOD,

From Mrs Caroline Gardner

Sir, A year spent in France has increased my pleasure in the enforced manner in which the French shake hands in greeting one another. Little currents of warmth generate as colleagues, acquaintances, young and old, rich and poor make this brief sign of mutual acceptance.

For me, the problem in this country is not the handshake in church but the lack of it outside.

From Miss S. J. Hill

Sir, To avoid handshaking, the answer is to become an organist, then choose your church carefully. I am able to remain closeted in the organ loft, thus avoiding any active part in the exchange of greetings, while enjoying a bird's eye view of the proceedings.

When Lawrence first met Frieda

From Mrs Brenda Maddox

Sir, Mr Ian Weekley (letter, October 1) is among the incredulous who question the sources of the assertion in my book, The Married Man: A Life of D. H. Lawrence, that Lawrence and Frieda Weekley were in bed within 20 minutes of meeting each other in Nottingham in the spring of 1912. My sources are given both in the text and endnotes.

According to a memorandum by Lewis Richmond in the Nottingham County Record Office, Lawrence's Eastwood friend and mentor, William Hopkin, "had the story from Lawrence himself" that on the day that Professor Ernest Weekley invited him to lunch, Weekley was late and that he and Frieda "entered into sexual relationships within 20 minutes of his arrival".

The same report also appears in the memoirs of Mabel Dodge Luhan, the American art patron and writer, who invited the Lawrences to New Mexico in 1922 and heard Frieda's version of the first meeting. "In 20 minutes she had taken him," says Mrs Luhan, "She told me this herself."

Not the same quality of evidence as provided by a photograph or a Squidgy-tape, perhaps, but surely more reliable than many other supposed "facts" of Lawrence's life, taken from single, unsubstantiated statements in hagiographic memoirs written after Lawrence's death.

For a biographer to disregard two similar reports from disparate, disinterested parties would require the incident described to be either improbable or impossible. The 20-minute encounter was neither. Frieda, committed to Eros, is known to have been proudly adept at swift coupling. Even her own decorous autobiography allows that she had Lawrence to herself in her private room for a half hour before lunch on that fateful day (and that "understanding leaped through our words").

Also, Lawrence's transparently autobiographical novel, Mr Noon, graphically describes an experienced German adulterer seducing a gauche young Englishman en route to the dining room, where a professor awaits them. Fiction can never be read as fact. But it can be taken as evidence of what is in an author's mind.

In Mr Noon (which he never pressed to have published in his lifetime) Lawrence shows himself spelling out with great detail and some humour, as if for a sceptical posterity, precisely how such a sexual lightning-strike can be accomplished.

Yours faithfully,

Post Office closures

From Ms Lisbeth A. Fewings

Sir, Philip Bassett's coverage of the Post Office privatisation debate (article, September 30; report, October 5) does not sufficiently underline the creeping privatisation of PO Counters Ltd. Since 1988 there has been a net loss of 800 main post offices from a national total of 1,500. In London alone more than 120 have closed or been "converted" — the PO's euphemism for privatisation — meaning sold to grocers, bureaux de change, newsagents, etc.

By 1998-99 the Post Office aims to remove all but 400 main post offices from the public sector.

Our own campaign is concerned with preserving Maida Hill post office from threatened closure and the consequent deterioration of the Harrow Road commercial district.

Yours etc,
LISBETH A. FEWINGS (Member, Save Maida Hill PO Campaign),

Harvest time

From Mr David Mowat

Sir, What nice old-fashioned spiders Dr Williams has in South Wales (letters, October 4 and 5). Ours are into new technology. Last week at 2.30am one set off the infra-red intruder alarm in the lounge. Yesterday when the video recorder stopped working, I found a spider gossamer on the manual control panel. It changed the day and the month!

Sorry, wrong aunt

From Monsignor E. G. Dunderdale

Sir, PH5 needs to revise his knowledge of P. G. Wodehouse. Aunt Dahlia would be deeply hurt by any description of her as "fearsome" (Diary, September 30). In her defence I quote no less an authority than Bertie Wooster himself: "Dahlia is my good and deserving aunt, not to be confused with Aunt Agatha, the one who kills rats with her teeth and devours her young". She also wore barbed wire next to the skin.

Yours faithfully to PGW,

OBITUARIES

CAPTAIN NIGEL PUMPHREY

Captain Nigel Pumphrey, DSO and two Bars, DSC, wartime coastal forces commander, died on September 29 aged 84. He was born on July 27, 1910.

DURING the Second World War, the motor torpedo boats and motor gunboats of the Royal Navy's coastal forces fought more than 450 battles in the narrow seas of the Dover Straits, the North Sea and the Channel, sinking some 270 enemy vessels at a cost to themselves of 76. Fought mainly at night, these battles involved groping for enemy convoys in often poor visibility, keeping as quiet as possible until contact was made. Then with all engines at full power, the dark hit up by explosions and multicoloured tracer shells, these lightly-built craft would close at high speed to the short ranges necessary for a successful torpedo attack. From 1941 onwards Nigel Pumphrey was in the thick of such actions, perhaps the most celebrated of which was the "Channel Dash" of the German battleships Scharnhorst and Gneisenau from Brest to the safety of the North Sea ports in February 1942.

Edward Nigel Pumphrey joined the Navy at Dartmouth in January 1924 and first went to sea under training in the battleships Nelson and Resolution. His career followed the normal pattern, with experience in smaller ships and educational courses at Greenwich and Portsmouth, followed by a tour at sea as a training establishment, HMS Clon. Later he went to the Far East and served in the river gunboat Seahen and the cruiser Dorsetshire until July 1939.

In April 1941, Pumphrey was appointed in command of the 6th Flotilla based at Dover, an early member of a gallant and much decorated band of officers. The famous artist and naturalist, the then Lieutenant-Commander Peter Scott, MBE, DSC and Bar, RNR, later wrote in his history of these operations: "They only achieved success at the cost of many promising lives, but by their daring, their bold initiative and their contempt of danger, they lived up to the highest traditions of the Navy."

At that time Dover boasted only six motor torpedo boats, formed in two flotillas, and two motor gunboats. Living in the Lord Warden Hotel, Pumphrey records that the early type of radar that was installed near Dover conferred a valuable tactical advantage. His flotilla was certainly busy and up to March 1942 Pumphrey himself took part in about twenty battles, some successful, some not.

He was mentioned in dispatches for the sinking of an escorted tanker in April 1941; this was followed by the award of the DSC for his part in a spirited action when his three boats attacked a heavily escorted convoy, sinking three ships. Pumphrey's boat was badly damaged (it was described by its coxswain as a "burning colander") and finally sank after reaching Ramsgate, he and two of his sailors suffering wounds. He was again mentioned in dispatches in November for the sinking of another enemy ship in the Dover Straits.

On the morning of February 12, 1942, Pumphrey was in his office "doing a little placid paperwork" and expecting a telephone call from the Dover command. But when the telephone did ring it was to convey no such humdrum information, but to tell him, instead, to sail immediately to intercept the battleships Scharnhorst and Gneisenau which, under the command of Vice-Admiral Cilius, had broken out of their Atlantic coast lair at Brest and were steaming up-Channel. They were accompanied by the heavy cruiser Prinz Eugen and a destroyer escort, not to mention sundry other small craft. Meanwhile, overhead an umbrella of Messerschmitt Me109s, Me110s and Focke-Wulf Fw190s, maintained by patrols flown in rotation from French and Dutch airfields, provided a formidable air defence.

The breakout had been widely expected, but it was not anticipated that Cilius would attempt the passage of the Straits of Dover in daylight. Furthermore, failures in aerial reconnaissance meant that the Germans had been steaming for more than 12 hours and were well into the Channel before they were spotted.

Despite being at four hours' notice, Pumphrey's five boats were at sea within twenty minutes. His laconic report says that, as his MTBs were being engaged by both aircraft and E-boats (the German torpedo/gunboat which was larger, faster and much more heavily armed than the MTB), he was unable to get closer than about 4,000 yards to the heavily armed warships which in that weather had a speed advantage. It was at first thought that a torpedo hit had been achieved on the leading ship, Prinz Eugen (afterwards shown to be the Scharnhorst), but the three German heavy ships escaped unscathed as they did from other British efforts to stop them, which included attacks by destroyers and the brave but futile attack by the Swordfish of 825 Squadron, Fleet Air Arm, which resulted in the loss of all its aircraft.

It was an audacious demonstration by the Germans which caused The Times, throwing aside its customary loyal wartime restraint, to thunder in a leading article of February 14, 1942: "Vice-Admiral Cilius has succeeded where the Duke of Medina Sidonia failed... Nothing more mortifying to the pride of seapower has happened in home waters since the 17th century."

Whatever the truth of this reflection (and it took no account of the fact, unknown at the time, that both Scharnhorst and Gneisenau had suffered severe damage from British mines) it was certainly not the fault of Pumphrey and his MTB crews, who had performed above themselves in adverse conditions. For this and his other actions, Pumphrey was awarded his first DSO.

In March 1942 he was in hospital with his third wound, later remarking with characteristic modesty and wit: "Can it be coincidence that every wound I suffered in the war was behind?" Having made an acknowledged contribution to the tactical doctrine of coastal forces, he was appointed in April to command the Hunt class destroyer Brocksley.

The Brocksley took part in the disastrous raid on Dieppe in August 1942, and sustained considerable damage from shore batteries, which so badly damaged her sister ship Berkeley that she had to be torpedoed to prevent her from falling into enemy hands. Emerging from smoke and fog, close to the shore, Brocksley almost suffered a like fate, but her own shooting got her out of a very tight corner. This action earned Pumphrey a Bar to his DSO.

In October 1942 Pumphrey took command of another Hunt class destroyer, the Goathland, and in company with the destroyer Albrighton, won a second Bar to his DSO for sinking an important German supply ship off the coast of Brittany.

After a year in the Goathland, he was promoted to Commander and joined Force L Normandy. After a short staff course, he joined Assault Group Force W in the Indian Ocean in November 1944 as deputy to the senior officer. His work, especially in establishing navigational aids in the approaches to Rangoon before an assault, earned him his third and fourth mentions in dispatches.

After the war he was assistant naval attaché in Paris until the end of 1947, when he was appointed second-in-command of the cruiser Liverpool in the Mediterranean. Two years as naval liaison officer at Trieste were followed by a tour in the Admiralty, and, as a Captain, command of Cardigan Bay and the 7th Frigate Squadron. This last seagoing appointment took him back to the Far East and must have been a particular pleasure, enhancing as it did his reputation as an admirable leader.

Having contemplated his probable future as an Admiralty bureaucrat, he applied to retire in 1956 and took up farming in Hampshire. With his wife Frances Salkeld, whom he married in 1940, he made, with typical method and flair, a success of both dairy and poultry farms and a fine National Gardens Scheme cottage garden.

His wife died in November last year. He is survived by their son and daughter.

LINA BASQUETTE

Lina Basquette, a Hollywood star of the silent film era, died in Wheeling, West Virginia, on September 30 aged 87. She was born in San Mateo, California, on April 19, 1907.

SULTRY and seductive, Lina Basquette epitomised the silent screen vamp, an image greatly intensified by her personal life which was sardined with lovers, husbands and romantic intrigue. For the tabloid press of the 1920s and 1930s, Basquette was staple fare, with nine marriages to seven different husbands, a series of quick-fire divorces, and very public affairs with the rich and famous. Her lovers included Jack Dempsey, Nelson Eddy and the Metropolitan Opera baritone Lawrence Tibbett.

Born Lena Basquette, the step-daughter of a dance instructor named Ernest Belcher and half-sister of the actress-dancer Marge Champion, Basquette made her stage debut at the age of eight when she appeared as a child ballerina at the 1915 San Francisco World's Fair. A year later she was signed by Universal Studios to star in a series of short films, the "Lena Basquette Features", and to play child roles in silent features.

She left the film world for a while to concentrate on her ballet talents, and at 16 became the leading female dancer of the Ziegfeld Follies on Broadway in the 1923 edition of the show.

Basquette's first marriage was in 1925, to the much older Sam Warner, one of the founders of Warner Brothers and the elder statesman of the company. The marriage lasted only two years, producing one daughter, before Warner died in 1927, leaving Basquette a huge fortune. But Warners contested the will, and the ensuing legal battle over the estate and custody of her daughter led her to a much-publicised series of suicide attempts.

She had resumed her acting career that same year, changing her name and taking a lead role in Serenade, but her screen work suffered from the backlash of the Warner marriage. Though she starred in Cecil B. De Mille's last silent movie, The Godless Girl (1929), most of her subsequent films — which included The Dude Wrangler (1930), Hard Hombres (1931) and The Final Hour (1936) — were minor, and her roles became smaller until, by the late 1930s, she was reduced to bit parts. Her last film, A Night for Crime, was made in 1943.

Basquette's tumultuous romantic life, however, kept her in the headlines until, in 1943, an American GI was accused of raping her and sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment. Shortly thereafter she retired from Hollywood. Always an avid dog lover, she bought kennels in Pennsylvania, and became one of the best-known breeders and handlers of champion Great Danes in America. She also wrote several books on dog breeding.

Lina Basquette is survived by one son and one daughter.

NIKOLAI TARASSOV

Nikolai Tarassov, a judge of the International Court of Justice, died in The Hague on September 28 aged 70. He was born on October 2, 1923.

A RUSSIAN career diplomat, Nikolai Tarassov had served on the International Court of Justice in The Hague since 1985. Before that he had held senior posts at the Soviet Ministry of Foreign Affairs and at the United Nations.

Nikolai Konstantinovich Tarassov was educated at Moscow State University where he read law and took a postgraduate degree. Afterwards he had a copper-bottomed diplomatic career which was fittingly prefaced with seven years' service to the Praesidium of the Supreme Soviet. He was consultant to the Praesidium's legal department, 1949-53, and from 1953 to 1956 was head of the office of the Secretary of the Praesidium.

By now a trusted functionary, he was sent abroad to be Counselor in the Soviet Embassy in Iran, where he remained from 1956 to 1961. Thereafter he had another seven years back in Moscow in senior appointments at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, before going abroad again as deputy permanent representative of the Soviet Union to the UN. During this period (1968-72) he was also the Soviet representative on the UN Commission on Human Rights.

From 1972 to 1976 he was Soviet Ambassador to Mexico and from 1976 until his election to the International Court was principal counsellor for foreign planning in the Soviet Ministry of Foreign Affairs. From 1976 to 1981 he led the Soviet delegation to the Vienna talks on mutual arms reductions.

As a member of the International Court of Justice, he came to prominence during debates on the legality of aspects of the situation in the former Yugoslavia in April last year, when he exercised the Russian option of dissent from a court ruling that Serbia must ensure that her army units did not commit genocide. His was the lone voice against a court ruling which was passed by 13 votes to one.

Tarassov died in office. He married, in 1955, Marianna Zinovieva. They had two daughters.

O. S. NOCK

O. S. Nock, railway historian and engineer, died in Bath on September 21 aged 89. He was born in Sutton Coldfield on January 21, 1905.

OSWALD NOCK was a legendary name among railway enthusiasts. He was arguably the leading railway historian of his day, from the great age of steam onwards, and certainly one of the most prolific, producing nearly a thousand articles for specialist magazines such as the Railway Magazine and The Engineer. He also published more than 140 books on the subject, dealing with every aspect of railway history — from the comparative performance of locomotive classes to detailed studies on engineering, from wistful eulogies to closed branch lines to histories of the great railway companies in Britain and abroad. His books sold around 10,000 copies in hardback, and while some of them may have been addressed to the lay reader the professionals found his technical grasp — even in the glossier publications — impossible to fault. Most of them, too, were written before Nock's retirement from what he considered to be his real job as a railway engineer.

His titles told the whole story of one man's obsession: The Great Western Railway, an appreciation; Father of Railways: The Story of George Stephenson; Out of the Line; The Last Years of British Steam; Historic Railway Disasters; Lines Across the Border; Underground Railways of the World. Nock had ridden on almost every railway across the globe, including the Japanese (which he found "closed in") and the new French TGV ("just like an airliner"). His own favourite was the British High Speed Train.

While most books on railway subjects tend essentially to consist of sets of variations on very few themes, Nock's books were appreciated by his readers for other qualities. His British Trains, Past and Present (1952), for example, looked at British engines and rolling-stock over the past 125 years — a well-worn subject among railway writers. But Nock's approach to it revealed, in addition, an artist's eye for colour, a traveller's delight in the changing countryside, and a delightful prose style.

The son of a bank manager, Oswald Stevens Nock — always known as "Ossie" — was educated at Giggleswick School. He recalled in his autobiography, Line Clear Ahead, that his only free time there — Sunday mornings — was notable because no trains ran on the line between Settle and Carlisle. He found them, as a result, interminably dull.

Afterwards he attended the City and Guilds Engineering College, 1921-25, and studied engineering at London University. He spent his entire working life thereafter in the service of the Westinghouse Brake & Signal Company, latterly as the chief mechanical engineer. He was fortunate to find there a kindred spirit in his immediate boss, a man almost as enthusiastic about trains as Nock; he would interrupt business meetings and jump on to the window sill in order to photograph some rare passing locomotive.

Nock's writing began in the 1930s as a means of supplementing his income, and to begin with his wife typed the books, which came out steadily at the rate of two a year. As his reputation grew, he came to count among his friends such legendary locomotive engineers as Sir Nigel Gresley and Roland Bond. He lived in Bath, surrounded by relics from the Turkish State Railway, and by model railways, including a replica of the running shed of Inverness station.

Besides railways, Nock loved the wild crags and rivers of Cumbria and the majesty of the Cornish coastline. His interests went beyond Castles, Compounds and Cloughts to include archaeology, astronomy, music and painting. His Another Facet of an Autobiography, published last year, included some of his excellent illustrations of trains, landscapes and seascapes.

Nock was rewarded with many honours, including the presidency of the Institute of Signal Engineers, and fellowship of the Institutes of Civil Engineers, Mechanical Engineers and Permanent Way. He met his wife Olivia in the buffet at King's Cross station, and they took their honeymoon on board The Flying Scotsman. She died seven years ago and he is survived by their son and daughter.

CAPE TO CAIRO RAILWAY

Important land settlement scheme

Sir Charles Metcalfe, who is leaving direct for the Victoria Falls to superintend the extension of the Cape to Cairo Railway from the Zambezi to Barotseland, will on his arrival in South Africa begin work upon a scheme which is about to be inaugurated for the settlement of colonists along the railway. In the course of an interview with Reuters representative before his embarkation, Sir Charles Metcalfe said:

"One of the greatest needs of South Africa is an increased white population. With the object of inducing colonists to come into the country now being tapped by the Cape to Cairo Railway, land is being surveyed which will be given out in free grants of 100 acres each to bona fide settlers. At the present moment we are reserving plots along the line from Bulawayo to Salisbury. No piece of land will be more than three miles distant from the railway. This scheme will be carried out north of Bulawayo right up to the Zambezi and beyond, as the railway progresses, and judging from last year's favourable results of cotton and tobacco cultivation, settlers should have a prosperous future before them."

"I expect that some settlers will begin taking up these grants in November. With £100 capital intending settlers ought to be able to support themselves until their first crops are saleable. If, after a year's experience, these settlers find the country and the prospects satisfactory, money will probably be advanced, where necessary, to enable them to send for their families and continue work on a larger scale."

"I know there are people who think the Cape to Cairo line mythical. There are others who shrug their shoulders at this railway development and say, 'Will it pay?' I am firmly of opinion that there will be not merely one line in this region, but that it will become a network of railways. I base this opinion on the productivity of the soil and the immense population there will be in that territory, now that we have absolutely stopped the slave trade."

PLAGUE ON THE TYNE

At a meeting of the River Tyne port sanitary authority at Newcastle yesterday Dr Barker, medical officer, mentioned the recent case of suspected bubonic plague on the river. The patient, the boatswain, was removed from the Bishopsgate to the hospital, and the remainder of the crew were medically examined, and all found well. With the exception of three, all remained on board and sailed with the ship for Port Said.

The Bishopsgate had come from Rosario and River Plate with grain and arrived at Hamburg all well, but during the unloading in Hamburg some dead rats were discovered and were found to be plague infected. The vessel was thoroughly fumigated, with the object of destroying the other rats. A new crew was signed on before the vessel left Hamburg for the Tyne, but the boatswain had already been engaged to clean up the holds and decks during the disinfection. The patient was now convalescent.

Wharton jailed for £43m loan fraud

By Sara McConnell and Helen Johnstone

ROY Wharton, chairman of Castlegate Securities and Castlegate Group Holdings, was yesterday jailed for five years for a £43-million mortgage fraud in which hundreds of investors were conned out of their life savings.

Wharton, who was found guilty at Oxford Crown Court last month on two charges of fraudulent trading, was told by Judge May that he had used people's money with "flagrant dishonesty" and had inflicted "misery and despair" on investors.

Many were elderly and retired, and had been tempted by Wharton's promise that they would get a return of 20 per cent a year if they invested a minimum of £250,000 in Castlegate's Capital Fund Owners' Plan, operated by Castlegate Securities between 1988 and 1990.

Castlegate's brochure promised "a unique opportunity for those who have substantial funds available and are looking for a high income without jeopardising their capital security". The Times was the first to highlight the Castlegate scam in July 1990, alerted by the company's attempts to place an advertisement in the paper. This was refused.

Thames Valley Police later described the paper's coverage of the case as a "very significant" contribution to the joint investigation by police and the Serious Fraud Office.

Investors' money was used to set up limited companies owned by the investors. These then made second and third mortgage advances to homeowners and smaller businesses. Castlegate acted on behalf of the companies, producing status enquiries, valuing properties and handling general administration work.

Castlegate guaranteed to make good any shortfall suffered by the companies.

However, the investors' companies lost millions of pounds after loans were made to homeowners seeking second mortgages on 550 "near-worthless" properties, whose values had been artificially inflated by Wharton. As the property slump sent house prices tumbling, Wharton increasingly lent to a small group of friends and business associates, who did not pay the interest due on their loans. The group included property developers and speculators. When these borrowers did not pay up, Wharton caused further advances to be made through the lending companies. This meant that investors were unwittingly advancing money to pay interest owed to them in the first place.

Police and the SFO searched Castlegate's premises in November 1990 after two Castlegate investment companies were placed in liquidation. Investigators subsequently discovered that more than half the loans had been made to 19 borrowers from 700 on the company's books. It also emerged that Wharton had withdrawn £400,000 from Castlegate to build a swimming pool at his home at Finchampstead, Berkshire.

Judge May told Wharton: "I take into account your previous good character, the strain of the last four years and also that this business was not started as a fraud. But it developed into a fraud and there were severe losses of many millions of pounds. People let you have their money to manage because they trusted you. You responded with flagrant dishonesty. Private investors lost their savings. You must have caused them misery and despair."

Adrian Redgrave, defending, said that Wharton had run the companies for 20 years before any dishonesty, and blamed the property crash. He said: "[Wharton] has lost everything he has ever worked for."

Still protecting investors: the author of Accounting for Growth has overcome his little difficulty at UBS and joined the merchant bank as a fund adviser

Terry Smith takes up job at Singer & Friedlander

By Robert Miller

TERRY Smith is back. The controversial analyst who was sacked by UBS, the broker, two years ago is to act as chief adviser to a new smaller companies fund launched today by Singer & Friedlander, the merchant bank.

Mr Smith should have been in the High Court this week for the long-awaited scrap between himself and UBS over an unfair dismissal claim, but UBS settled out of court with a ransomed severance cheque.

Mr Smith's alleged crime was to write a book, Accounting for Growth, an innocuous enough title but the contents were dynamite and it topped the UK best-seller list. The book outlined the 12 best ways to "fiddle" or be creative with company accounts.

For example, he suggested that many of Britain's top companies were making their profits look bigger by putting one-off items, such as property disposals, in with other general income business to give analysts the impression that these figures could be repeated every year.

Unfortunately the companies associated with the book also happened to be UBS clients. When news of the contents leaked, before publication, there was a concerted "stop the book" campaign.

It is generally reckoned that the final straw for UBS was a complaint from Sir Colin Marshall, a non-executive director of Grand Metropolitan and then chairman-designate of British Airways. Mr Smith was summoned and was escorted from the UBS building, never to return.

Yesterday, he said: "I was flabbergasted... The publisher thought it was a good book that might sell a few thousand copies. I still don't think I did anything wrong. My job is to protect investors and that's what I was doing."

Exports lead recovery

By Janet Bush and Ross Tremain

EXPORTS are taking over from consumer demand as the engine of Britain's recovery. Sir Bryan Nicholson, the president of the Confederation of British Industry, said.

With retail sales growth slowing, and exports outpacing imports, the economy looks as if it is set for a period of steady, sustained growth, coupled with relatively subdued inflation, he told businessmen in Drogheda, Co. Wick.

This week's coincided with publication of government figures that showed Britain's trade deficit narrowed slightly in July as export growth outstripped rising imports. The visible trade deficit was £704 million in July compared with £729 million in June.

Sir Bryan said the recovery was now changing in character. Retail sales, which rose 2.6 per cent year-on-year during the second quarter, were slowing. But in manufacturing, investment in plant and machinery was rising. Exports of goods and services rose more than 9 per cent in the 12 months to June.

The CSO figures showed that the value of exports rose 1 per cent between June and July, while the value of imports rose 0.5 per cent. Excluding oil and cratic items, the deficit fell to £1.27 billion in July, from £1.34 billion in June.

The CSO said that the deficit is on a narrowing trend. City economists predicted a far lower current account deficit this year than the Treasury's summer forecast of £9.5 billion. Jonathan Loynes, economist at Midland Global Markets, is forecasting a current account deficit this year of £4 billion.

Hosre Govett attributed the improvement in Britain's trade performance to a near doubling in the surplus on oil and an improved underlying picture, particularly in trade with countries outside the EU.

Simon Briscoe, at SG Warburg, said that export growth already appears to be slowing, suggesting a fall in the pace of overall economic expansion.

Man shares flop on opening day

MORE than 12,500 private shareholders in E D & F Man, the international trader and food processor, are facing an instant loss on their investment after its shares plunged to an immediate discount as dealmakers started on the stock market (Martin Waller writes).

The shares, offered to the public at 180p, fell to 169p before stabilising at 172p for most of the day. The poor start to trading is another blow to the new issues market, already hit by unsteady performances from equities and bonds in recent months.

Man was the second-biggest float in London so far this year, with a total price-tag of £462 million. Tempus, page 28

Argyll checks out of discount stores

By Susan Gilchrist

ARGYLL, Britain's third-biggest supermarket operator, yesterday announced its intention to check out of the discount end of the food retailing market with the disposal of its Lo-Cost chain.

The group, which also owns Safeway and Presto, is selling 101 Lo-Cost stores and the Lo-Cost trading name to Co-operative Retail Services (CRS) for up to £73 million.

The move follows the disposal of 151 small Lo-Cost stores to Spar for about £20 million in August. The 50 remaining outlets will also be sold in due course. Argyll's withdrawal from the discount sector follows a fundamental review of the Lo-Cost business, which has been a major casualty of increased competition.

CRS is to pay a minimum consideration of £59 million plus an additional amount of up to £14 million based on the average sales of the stores in the eight weeks up to the November 12 completion date. In addition to the 101 stores, CRS is buying a freehold distribution depot at Queensferry, Chwyd, and has agreed to lease Lo-Cost's two other distribution depots at Salford, Manchester, and Shrewsbury.

An Argyll spokesman said there would be about 60 redundancies among the chain's 3,800 employees. About £3 million will be charged to the group's profit and loss account in the current year to cover the cost of redundancies and closures.

Argyll expects to raise between £86 million and £100 million from the disposal of the whole chain. The remaining stores are unlikely to be sold in one block, and some may have to be closed if buyers cannot be found.

The spokesman said: "We are pleased to have got on as clearly as we have, and we can now concentrate on Safeway and Presto." Analysts said the price was satisfactory enough given the weak state of the business. Lo-Cost made operating profits of £6.3 million on sales of £471 million in the year to April 2.

Hollinger set to buy Telegraph shares

By Sarah Bagwell

INFLUENTIAL institutional shareholders yesterday hit out at Hollinger's public announcement that, from Monday, it intended to buy shares in The Telegraph plc, publisher of The Daily Telegraph and The Sunday Telegraph.

Hollinger, a Canadian company controlled by Conrad Black, who also controls the newspapers, said that it intended to buy about 5 per cent of The Telegraph's equity. This would lift its holding to 62 per cent.

This is the second time in recent months that The Telegraph has been at the centre of City institutions' wrath. In June, it shocked investors with the timing of a cut in the cover price of The Daily Telegraph.

Yesterday, institutional investors said that they could see no reason for the formal statement beyond wanting to push the share price up. The shares rose by 20p, to 330p.

David Manning, a director of UK equities with Legal & General, said: "The recent behaviour of Hollinger as a major shareholder in The Telegraph is all at odds with that expected in the UK market by institutions. This announcement tends to dissuade investors from taking, or keeping, a stake in The Telegraph."

Another institutional shareholder said: "I suppose Conrad Black is doing it just to ensure there is no impropriety in the share dealings. But I don't think Hollinger will buy many shares because it was obvious the announcement would push the share price up."

In June, Conrad Black was subjected to accusations of impropriety when the cover price of The Daily Telegraph was cut a month after Hollinger sold a large chunk of Telegraph shares to a range of City firms at about 596p a share. On the day the cut was announced, the shares fell by 191p, to 349p. The Stock Exchange cleared him of any wrongdoing.

According to the statement, Hollinger "will purchase ordinary shares in The Telegraph, if available, at or around current market prices, and is prepared, initially, to buy up to 6.8 million ordinary shares of The Telegraph's issued ordinary share capital."

One shareholder said: "It is unbelievable. Hollinger is a major shareholder and they are trading in and out of The Telegraph shares. It leaves you thinking that they sold the shares in June because they were overpriced."

Close shave for listing of Calluna on USM

By MARTIN WALLER

A SCOTTISH maker of portable disk drives for portable computers is heading for the stock market at the end of this month with a price tag of more than £30 million. But the float would be impossible three months later, as Calluna is required by stock market rules to go the Unlisted Securities Market route.

The USM is closing for new applicants at the end of this year, and companies like Calluna, which has only been in existence since 1991, has yet to make an operating profit and lacks the necessary trading record, are not permitted to go for a full listing.

Norman White, managing director of Calluna, said the placing, by Albert E Sharp, the broker, would provide his business with the resources to fully exploit opportunities in the expanding 1.8-inch disk drive market for portable laptop computers.

The company is expected to raise £10 million to £12 million of fresh funds to support development of its product, the Callunacard. Fully compatible with the latest computer industry standards, the device is about the size of a credit card, though heavier, and packs as much information as 80 standard floppy disks.

Calluna, of Glenrothes, Fife, is thought to be the only company from Europe to make 1.8 inch disk drives. The full prospectus should give an indication of when the group expects profits.

Pension proposals 'could devastate stock markets'

By JON ASHWORTH

STEPS to protect members of UK company pension schemes from another Maxwell-style scandal could have a catastrophic effect on stock markets and burden employers with enormous costs, a survey has found.

Employers accept the need to strengthen the security of members' pension rights but consider the financial burden to be unacceptably onerous, according to a survey of 60 companies by KPMG, the accountant.

Charles Evers, head of KPMG Actuarial Services, said the Government needed to re-examine proposals for a minimum solvency standard, put forward in the recent White Paper on pension reform. He said: "A radical change to investment policy from equities to fixed interest would be the only protection available. This would be very expensive for companies in the long run — in some cases it could almost double the cost of pension provision."

Mr Evers said companies would have only three months to put in extra cash if the solvency margin fell below 90 per cent. He added: "Whilst we agree solvency levels need continuous monitoring, and that pension fund security needs improving, we believe a longer term approach is needed. Companies should be allowed much more time to correct for deficiencies, which might after all be caused by temporary market conditions."

Under the proposals, companies would be obliged to have the solvency of their pension funds checked every year. Legislation cementing the proposals is expected in the next parliamentary session. Mr Evers said it was critically important to seek an amendment to the solvency proposals while there was still time. He said: "It's all very scary stuff. If people did move out of shares, it would have a major effect on markets. Industry could be starved of equity capital."

Sharp stock market movements could force even well-funded final salary pension schemes to top up their holdings, even though such fluctuations are often temporary. If a £1 billion scheme was 80 per cent solvent following such a market movement, the employer would have three months in which to find £125 million to top it up. If all final salary schemes were to reduce equity exposure to 50 per cent, as much as £150 billion would be switched from equities and properties to fixed interest investments. This would cause severe disruption to capital markets.

In a paper submitted to the Government, KPMG says more emphasis should be placed on a long-term funding standard than on the proposed short term wind up standard. Minimum standards for long-term funding methods and assumptions, combined with controls to ensure that employers pay proper contributions in a timely fashion, would underpin benefit and employee security and cause less damage to the finances of the sponsoring companies.

Joint chief to leave T&S

By SARAH BAGNALL

STEPHE Boddice is standing down as joint managing director of T&S Stores, the tobacco, confectionery and newsagents group that owns the Supergrims and Dillons chains.

Mr Boddice, 42, is to retire at the end of the year after 17 years as a director of T&S. The company refused to say whether any compensation was owed.

Jim McCarthy, the other joint managing director, is being promoted to the new post of chief executive. David Crellin, who joined the company in 1990, is becoming finance director. Mr McCarthy joined the group in 1989 when T&S Stores acquired Dillons. He began as group retail director before being made joint managing director in October 1993. Mr Boddice was made joint managing director at the same time.

Kevin Threlfall, chairman, said: "Stephe and I have worked closely together for almost 20 years, within which timescale, the company has grown from three kiosks to over 700 stores."

Last year, the group made pre-tax profits of £12.6 million, up from £12.5 million previously. In March, it announced the acquisition of Macs Stores, the convenience store chain, as part of its plans to add 50 stores in the current year.

BAe ready to name bid terms for VSEL

By ROSE TYRMAN
INDUSTRIAL CORRESPONDENT

BRITISH Aerospace is clearing the decks to announce an agreed takeover bid for shipbuilder VSEL next week after the Ministry of Defence signalled it had no objection to the deal.

Discussions over a recommended offer at up to £13 a share, valuing VSEL at £464 million, are set to continue between negotiators representing the two companies over the weekend.

Steady progress has been made during talks since VSEL announced the bid approach a week ago. The broad details of an offer are believed to have been agreed, and advisors are said to be concentrating on "loose ends".

Roger Freeman, the defence procurement minister, apparently indicated that his ministry was unlikely to oppose a takeover during a visit to VSEL's yard at Barrow-in-Furness this week. Both sides worry that they may have trouble selling the deal to their shareholders and the City.

VSEL has long believed it could benefit from having a larger partner. But BAe has been focused on reducing, rather than extending, the range of its businesses, and will have to work hard to convince that VSEL will not become an albatross as its Trident workload runs down.

Watchdog fines three traders

By JON ASHWORTH

THREE traders have been fined and removed from City registers by the Securities and Futures Authority. David Todd, a former trader with City Index, David Smith, formerly of Refco Overseas, and John Veglio, formerly of Lehman Brothers Securities, were taken off the SFA register by their employers. They have not been re-registered.

Mr Todd has been fined £10,000, severely reprimanded and required to pay £2,550 SFA costs. He had arranged to use Mr Smith's account at City Index to circumvent house rules prohibiting dealers from trading on their own account. Mr Todd was found to have dealt outside the bid/offer spread to enhance profits.

Mr Smith, fined £5,000, reprimanded and required to pay £2,550 costs, failed to tell Refco that he had an account at City Index. Mr Todd and Mr Smith have since repaid their profits to City Index.

Mr Veglio, who traded in Japanese equity warrants, was sacked by Lehman when it discovered that a number of positions had been valued incorrectly, concealing substantial losses. He was fined £5,000 and ordered to pay £5,950 costs.

Growth in US jobs fuels rate rise fears

FURTHER robust growth in the number of jobs being created in America yesterday strengthened the likelihood of the American Federal Reserve raising interest rates. Both the July and August payroll figures were revised upwards and brought the average monthly increase in payrolls during the third quarter to 258,000. During September, non-farm payrolls rose by 239,000. The increase in payrolls pushed the rate of unemployment down to 5.9 per cent in September, from 6.1 per cent in August. It was the lowest rate recorded since October 1990.

American analysts believe that a level of around 6 per cent means that the competition for manpower will push wages up in an inflationary manner. The bulk of the jobs created came from the lower-paying service sector, which analysts said helped to contain wage inflation. Few manufacturing jobs were created in September. Robert Reich, the American Labour Secretary, said the latest government employment report points to continued economic expansion in America. He said: "The message is clearly steady as the goes. The jobs expansion continues."

MacGregor rejoins bank

JOHN MacGregor, the former Transport Secretary, is rejoining Hill Samuel, the merchant bank, which is advising the Department of Transport on the Channel Tunnel rail link. Mr MacGregor, 57, who asked to leave the Government in the July reshuffle, worked for the bank for 11 years before a 15-year ministerial career. Now he has been made non-executive deputy chairman of Hill Samuel, part of TSB Group. Hill Samuel was selected last year to advise on the rail link after a competition among banks. Mr MacGregor, who is MP for Norfolk South, asked to take no part in the selection process because of his former links with the bank.

Dartmoor hunts Sphere

DARTMOOR Investment Trust has launched a £52.4 million hostile paper bid for rival Sphere Investment Trust. Sphere's directors told shareholders to take no action on the bid. The board, said that in consultation with SG Warburg Securities, its advisers, it was studying the terms of the offer and would make a further announcement in due course. Dartmoor holds 7.01 per cent of Sphere's issued income and residual capital shares, and said yesterday that it had also received letters of intention to accept the share offer in respect of a total of 45.45 per cent of shares, including a letter from Abtrust, which holds 22.94 per cent of Sphere shares.

US pollution move fails

LLOYD'S of London yesterday expressed disappointment that efforts to reform US legislation on the clean-up of polluted sites had been put on hold for a year after moves to reform the so-called Superfund laws ran out of time before the Congressional elections. Earlier, this year Superfund reform was heralded as the jewel in the crown of President Bill Clinton's environmental programme. The existing Superfund law requires the polluter to pay the costs of clean-up. The reform Bill will now have to be re-negotiated next year, when there is likely to be an even stronger anti-vote from the Republicans.

Iraqi advance lifts oil

OIL prices were given a surprise boost from reports that Iraqi troops were advancing towards the Kuwaiti frontier, triggering market concern about renewed hostilities in the oil-rich region. On the London International Petroleum Exchange, the benchmark Brent blend crude contract for November delivery jumped to $17.25 per barrel. The 28 cent rise injected fresh vigour into the three-week rally in oil prices, which had repeatedly petered out at just above $17. Iraq is reported to be suffering serious food shortages without oil export earnings to pay for imports and has been lobbying hard for UN sanctions to be lifted.

Next buys shops

NEXT, the high street fashion retailer, has acquired four new shop units as part of its plans to increase its average store size in order to carry a broader range. Two of the sites, in Peterborough and Brent Cross, are adjacent to existing stores and will enable these outlets to be extended. The new store in Derby is a relocation for its smaller existing site and a further site in Carmarthen has been acquired. All the units were acquired for the chain by Healey & Baker. David Jones, Next's chief executive, said last month that the group is looking to expand about 100 of its 302 stores either by relocation or by acquiring adjacent shop sites.

US closure costs jobs at Dawson

By SUSAN GILCHRIST

DAWSON International, the leading textile group best known for its Ballantyne and Pringle brands, is closing one of its factories in America, with the loss of 250 jobs.

The group is shutting its shower curtain and bathroom accessories plant in Vienna, Ohio, as part of its plans to return Dawson Home Fashions, its American subsidiary, to profitability. The plant will be phased out over the next six months and merged with the group's remaining site in Sardinia, Mississippi. 250 of the 700 employees will go, although some new jobs may be created.

Nick Kuensberg, Dawson's managing director, refused to disclose the exact cost of the reorganisation but said it was amply covered by the £12 million provision made in its 1994 accounts.

Salomon is braced for $100m loss

By PATRICIA TESHAN
BANKING CORRESPONDENT

SALOMON, the giant US investment bank, yesterday gave some idea of the likely bloodbath on Wall Street this month with a warning that it has made a net $100 million loss in the third quarter.

Salomon and other US brokerages report their third-quarter figures later this month. They will reveal the devastation wreaked on their business by chaos in world financial markets. Salomon is due to report its figures on, or about, October 20.

Salomon said that, as a result of its losses, it was "closely reviewing the pace of new initiatives". Unlike its major competitors, Salomon has not had a dramatic increase in headcount and is, therefore, thought unlikely to be planning swingeing job cuts.

Analysts interpreted this as a decision to cut back on global expansion.

Many Wall Street firms are expected to report lower profits after volatility in equity and bond markets and a series of interest rate increases in the US that have hit trading and underwriting volumes. Kidder Peabody is considering selling its retail broking business after its problems. This week, Kidder said that it was moving between $20 billion and $30 billion of securities to another part of its parent, General Electric, in a restructuring.

After poor trading results and a public admission of disappointing profits performance, Goldman Sachs is reported to be about to cut up to 500 staff, close to 10 per cent of its workforce. The bank refuses to comment on the reports.

BARCLAYS BANK: Andrew Buxton and Martin Taylor

Old and new turn leadership into joint account

A former journalist and a banker from a founding family are sharing roles in a new Barclays. Patricia Tehan reports

The boardroom of Barclays Bank has been the scene of a series of dramatic and controversial events in the past four years. The appointment of a new chief executive in January followed a year of intense media and shareholder criticism of Andrew Buxton who had at first resisted pressure to split the roles of chairman and chief executive. It also came as Barclays was on the road to recovery after suffering the first loss in its history.

In April 1992, Buxton's plans to take over the combined role attracted criticism that this was too much concentration of power. His timing was superb, coming as institutional shareholders were voicing support for Sir Adrian Cadbury's recommendation that there should be a separation of power at the top.

Buxton bowed to pressure. Then came the appointment of Martin Taylor. Not only did his £737,500 annual pay packet raise eyebrows, but there was a journalist turned textile manufacturer with little knowledge of banking coming in to run Britain's biggest bank.

At the beginning of this year, with an almost perceptible sigh of relief, Buxton handed over the day-to-day running of Barclays to Taylor.

Ever since then, all eyes have been on the pair to see if Buxton can let go, and if Taylor is up to the job.

It is a question that irritates both. They insist that, in spite of the drama surrounding the appointment, they most certainly do get on.

There is a 13-year age gap and they do not look alike, which, they say, leads some people to assume that they are very different personalities with different approaches to business. Buxton, 55, is still, formal and reserved. His image is that of the traditional banker — pinstripe suit, white shirt and plain tie. Taylor, 42, has an altogether more relaxed image. He leans back in his chair, fidgets and waves his arms, gesturing around the room. His soft suits, coloured shirts and jazzy ties lend an informal image.

However, Buxton says: "We do see eye to eye on a remarkable number of issues." He says that he has heard himself described as "a tremendously traditional banker who does not want anything to change," but he argues: "I would not have gone out to recruit Martin if I did not want more changes."

Buxton announced his change of mind in January 1993. He says: "When I set out to recruit a chief executive, I wanted the best business manager we could find. It did not matter whether he was a banker or not."

Although their job descriptions were set out on paper, he says: "When it actually comes to working as a partnership, the job descriptions got slightly blurred."

Buxton's own job description as chairman would make him responsible for the strategy of the group, "but it is inconceivable that the group should not be heavily affected by the chief executive".

Because Barclays has been Buxton's life. As a member of one of the bank's founding families, it was natural that he would work for Barclays. He joined the bank 31 years ago. He says Taylor, still very new to Barclays and to banking, is able to use him as a sounding board.

Any initial apprehension about Taylor's appointment among the bank's senior managers soon vanished, Buxton says. "Martin has the ability to be a nice person at the same time and to manage people," he says. "That is a marvellous quality in a very senior manager."

All eyes have been on the pair to see if Buxton can let go, and if Taylor is up to the job.

Andrew Buxton, left, chairman of Barclays, and Martin Taylor, chief executive. Buxton declares it a huge relief to have this "very competent person running the business"

Many find it hard to believe that Buxton handed over the reins willingly, but he says that he was glad to do so: "It was a huge relief to know that I had a very competent person running the business." The decision to split the roles "certainly benefited me personally", Buxton says. With Taylor running the bank, Buxton says that it gives him time to think about the business.

The two have worked together part-time since last November and full-time since January. Their roles are, therefore, still evolving, and "the relationship will inevitably change as Martin gets to know the business better". Buxton admires Taylor's management ability and direct approach, though he acknowledges that their short relationship has yet to be tested.

Mr Taylor says that he was determined to start the new job as he meant to go on. "One of the things that I regretted very much in my last role was that I was not direct enough," he says. When he became chief executive of Court-aud's Textiles, he was much younger than managers working for him. "I found it very difficult to be as direct as my instincts told me that I ought to be," he says. As a result, he believes that he lost ground and wasted time. "I was determined when I came to Barclays not to repeat my mistake, so perhaps Andrew is seeing the new me, being determined to face up to things straight away," he says.

Taylor's task has been helped by the improvement in the bank's financial results. Taylor says that he was not coming in to help to turn the business round, because that was already happening: "It was what happened next that was important."

After the drama surrounding Taylor's appointment, the City was keen for an early sign of his impact. That came in April, when he announced sweeping senior management changes and a restructuring of divisions. He hopes that future changes will be less exciting to the outside world "but of quite durable value internally".

In his new job, Taylor says, he has to be more obviously rational about things and less intuitive. "and actually I am quite an intuitive person and I got to a stage in my last job that I was relying, probably to an excessive extent, on intuition".

He says that some intuitive habits are returning where he will "decide things first and work out why later". Though he says his intuition is "less often wrong than logical deduction with a flawed premise".

Buxton's sense of the bank's history has been of great help to Taylor. Without an understanding of an organisation's dynamics, he says, "you get a lot wrong".

As Taylor starts to rely more on intuition, he will "make more subtle and intelligent use of Andrew and my other colleagues".

He pressed the point of the separation of the roles at interview because "it was absolutely essential that I could feel that Andrew really did want me to come here... and was not just making an appointment because he felt that he was being pushed into it."

He says that people's view, at the time, that Buxton simply wanted to keep power in his hands, "if you know him, is a ridiculous idea."

He says: "The thing I most admire about Andrew is his courage. You only have to go to our annual general meeting to see that. It is a ridiculous place to have it displayed, but there it is." He admires the way "Andrew actually brought the bank through the last couple of years under enormous attack. I like people who do that. It is a rare quality."

Far from finding Buxton reluctant to let go, he says that "Andrew was very anxious to get me up and running as soon as he could... If anything, he was pushing things on to me faster than I felt entirely comfortable with."

Although Taylor is the more outgoing, he finds it hard to be constantly on display having to be "cheerful, incisive and awake". He says: "I am not actually wildly extrovert and I suffer from severe personality overstretch in this job."

It makes him want to bury himself away at weekends. It is getting easier, though, as people at Barclays get to know him better. Buxton says that he is not a "bombastic, domineering character. If he were, perhaps he would not have split the job. Taylor says that if he had been, he wouldn't have come. He says: "It would be terrible if Andrew had handed over his executive authority and then felt constant doubts about whether it was in good hands."

Bankers and brokers learn alternative skills at the circus

City high-flyers are heading for the flying trapeze. The Circus Space, a school for jugglers and trapeze artists built in the shell of the old Shoreditch power station in east London, is packing in bankers and brokers looking to relax after a day at the dealing screens.

The school, a registered charity supported by SG Warburg, Slaughter and May and Dewe Rogerson, is fast emerging as an alternative venue for corporate hospitality functions, as well as providing an outlet for stressed executives.

Charlie Holland, production and marketing director, said The Circus Space is the only venue in Britain where one can learn the full range of circus skills. "What we offer is a whole range of classes for people of all dispositions and backgrounds," said Mr Holland, 33. "There is increasing interest from people in the City. You can either join an incredibly expensive gym, or get the same effect with much more fun."

Supporters of the project include Richard Branson, who has hired the trapeze act for parties at his Oxfordshire estate. Many of the clients are computing staff from the City who, it seems, have an aptitude for juggling. They have been known to work out theoretical juggling sequences on their computers before coming in to attempt the real thing. Staff from Hoare Govett, Goldman Sachs and SG Warburg have tried their luck.

Isabelle Terrillon, who devises complex financial structures for Nomura, has become a dab hand on the flying trapeze. "I think it's more exciting than bungee jumping or parachuting," says Ms Terrillon, 29, who discovered the trapeze while holidaying in the Caribbean ten years ago. "Not only is it a thrilling experience, but it's an art and a great way to exercise. You really learn a lot. Each time I go there I get the thrill of my life."

The Square Mile has done much to support the project. SG Warburg helped to raise £500,000 of the £2 million needed to turn the once-derelict power station off Finsbury Square in Hackney into a world-class training venue for circus performers. Slaughter and May wrote the lease. Dewe Rogerson designed a fund-raising brochure and looks after marketing and public relations. Together, the firms have contributed free time and advice worth an estimated £200,000 on top of funds already raised.

Grime-stained workers who kept the turbines running before the power station shut down more than 40 years ago would be hard-pressed to recognise their former home. Rotting floorboards have been replaced, the walls have been scrubbed down and a new roof has been thrown over some of the chambers. Ropes have been strung from ceilings and temporary floodlights have been rigged up. About a third of the site has been developed so far.

The aim is to create a world-class circus training and production centre that will have something to offer the local community. Rehearsal and dance studios will be built in chambers that once housed generators and incinerators. There are plans for a café overlooking a paved courtyard. Pinstriped types can sit in on a range of evening classes covering everything from tumbling for beginners to advanced flying trapeze. Bankers keen to work off the business flab may care to try their hand at stillwalking or unicycling, or perhaps venture out on the tightrope. More manic types can try whip cracking or knife throwing — always useful in the dealing room.

Courses typically cost £20 for three sessions. There is also potential for team-building and corporate hospitality events. A company could hire the venue for the afternoon for about £500 — what some firms are willing to pay for a single ticket to Wimbledon. "We sometimes have groups of 24-30 people in for the afternoon," said Mr Holland. "It's good for team building. You don't get to stand on someone else's shoulders every day."

The school, set up in 1989, moved to its new home in July after temporarily occupying a derelict timber store in Islington, north London. Attendance by aspirant artists has grown from little more than 2,500 in the first year to more than 15,000 last year. Financial turnover has grown from about £16,000 to more than £240,000 in the same period. The number of users is expected to double to 30,000 once the site is fully developed.

The aim is to make The Circus Space one of the top four or five circus skills training centres in the world. Mr Holland is grateful for any support. "Circus is an area that tends to get marginalised," he said. "It's not in the sports or arts funding systems but has a lot to do with both. We are regenerating the circus tradition and moving it along."

The efforts have not been without success. One former student has been accepted by the exclusive French National Circus School — one of only 12 students taken in for a two-year internship. More than 200 trainees have gone on to perform in a range of productions all over the world, with companies from Australia's Circus Oz to amateur productions of Barnum. Evening cabaret performances are attracting a growing audience.

Mr Holland is looking for sponsors willing to lend their names to rooms and chambers. He said: "There is an opportunity in circus for an imaginative company to have something that is unique." The immediate task is to find £13,000 for a sunken gymnastic and trampolining pit.

Companies with cash to spare will not be turned away. Anyone else who fancies him or herself as a juggler or high-wire performer is just as welcome.

Remember, too, that these are shark-infested waters. John Percival of Chescor, the currency specialists, has monitored entirely credible reports of aggressive selling by the stronger funds, designed to trigger a cascade of stop-loss selling. This helps the aggressor to buy back into the markets cheaply, and it drives competitors out of business. That is what is meant by a bear market—a market in which speculators try to drive prices down, not up. This one is unusually vicious and persistent because this is a global market. London, with its relatively high returns, attracted a lot of Wall Street professional money, and it seems to have been mainly American selling that has had such an impact on the thin London market. Since the American bears are still deep in debt, there is a high risk of more selling raids.

But the moral, as you should have detected, is quite different. A bear market is not an occasion for the soundly-financed outsider to sell, or even just to keep his head down. It is a buying opportunity.

Friendly Society beats Money Marketing survey

Proof that the safe option can also be very profitable

Traditional wisdom has it that friendly societies, with their traditional values and cautious investment of their members' money, find it difficult to compete with the heavy-weight, powerful investors from the major life insurances.

Yet, according to a recent survey carried out by Money Marketing magazine, just the opposite has proved to be true.

Their survey of 10 year with-profits policies maturing on 1st April 1994, was based on a male aged 30 next birthday at outset, paying a premium of £35 per month over 10 years - in all, a total of £4200 in premiums. Of the 27 major life institutions surveyed, maturity values ranged from £6521 up to £8427. Had National Deposit Friendly Society's ten year savings plan been included in their figures at £8429*, it would have come out £2 ahead of the top, big institution performer, and an incredible £436 ahead of the next best result!

*An equivalent annual return of 15.33% net.

Biggest, is by no means always the best

As a relatively small player in the financial services market, National Deposit did not feature in the survey (although the Society's assets do, in fact, exceed £100 million.)

However, a comparison of the results of the survey with figures available from National Deposit, prove that if you're looking to invest your money wisely for a high return, make sure that you carry out a thorough and wide search of the market before you make a commitment. You'll find that the biggest institutions are not necessarily the best.

Tax Free benefits

The proceeds of the National Deposit Ten Year Savings Plan are paid totally tax free on maturity. In addition, the tax exempt element of your premium (the first £18 per month or £200 per year) is invested in a tax exempt fund, which is completely free of all taxation. This increases the surpluses to be used for bonuses.

Lump sums make even more of your money

Choosing to invest a lump sum with the Society to generate annual payments for your 10 Year Savings Plan will save you even more money. For example, on a single lump sum investment of £4000 the Society will guarantee the payment of 10 annual premiums of £500 - a total of £5000! What's more, you can watch your money grow every year, since the bonuses attached to policies are guaranteed and cannot be withdrawn.

Start saving now - up to £50 cash back offer

What's more, if you start your plan with us within the next 2 months you can receive up to £50 back in cash immediately!

A secure 'home from home' for your money

More and more people are turning towards friendly societies because they know they are run by the Members (policy holders) - people just like them. They want to be part of a Society that frequently out-performs its rivals in the marketplace. A Society that maximises tax benefits. And most important of all, a Society that guarantees a secure home for their money - The National Deposit Friendly Society.

The Vatman is giving clubs a sporting chance, Liz Dolan reports

Concessions available to non-profit making sports clubs could stop the Vatman winning game, set and match

Sports club organisers have been urged to beef up their knowledge of tax rules in order to make full use of two recent government concessions - value-added tax exemption for non-profit making clubs and the trickle-down effect of the National Lottery.

According to Touche Ross, the accountant, people who decide to take on the organisation of a sports club's financial affairs are often unaware of the tax pitfalls, or even benefits, involved. They may not have the expertise or resources to deal with such issues, it says.

At the same time, the average tennis, bowls or cricket club cannot necessarily afford to employ expensive accountants to do the job for them.

Although about £10 million a year has been put back into sport as a result of the new VAT exemption for sports clubs, Touche Ross points out that the sports community still contributes substantial amounts of VAT to the Exchequer. For every £1 of government money received, almost £7 still goes back to the taxman, some of which is paid unnecessarily. The accountant has linked with the Sports Council to launch two booklets: Taxation a guide for sports organisations and VAT and Sport. Written in plain English, they are both intended to show organisations how to make maximum use of funds raised for the benefit of members.

Play by the VAT rules

Meanwhile, sports are beginning to fly in amateur sports clubs as VAT rebate cheques start to drop on to treasurers' doorsteps. Changes in Customs & Excise rules, announced on April 1, mean that non-profit-making clubs can now apply for VAT rebates on subscriptions paid after January 1, 1990. While committees are on the whole keen to hang on to the cheques and use them for the benefit of the club as a whole, some members are equally keen to claw back their share of the cash.

According to Peter Duboff, the accountant, a mini-riot took place recently at Hartsbourne Golf & Country Club, in Bushey Heath, Hertfordshire, when the committee announced that a tax rebate worth up to £487,000 would be retained for the club as a whole rather than returned to individual members.

Taxation - a guide for sports organisations and VAT and Sport are available free from 071-936 3000

HOW TO UNBURDEN YOURSELF

- Avoid the need to register for VAT by: a) organising sections of the club into independent units; b) organising certain events outside the club.
- Avoid VAT liability by obtaining a donation from people in exchange for tickets for events.
- Remember that there is a longer VAT cashflow benefit for an invoice issued at the start of a VAT quarter rather than the end. Sponsorship money is normally VATable, but some sponsors, such as banks and building societies, are partially exempt. Part of a sponsorship package may be eligible for relief.

- Make sure that VAT is charged where it is due. If not, you may be unable to recover it later.
- If your financial record-keeping is seriously behind, ask permission from Customs & Excise, in writing, to submit an estimated return rather than risk a fine for a late return.

MURRAY EMERGING ECONOMIES TRUST PLC

As the frontiers of the developed world were pushed outward a century ago, Scottish engineers and entrepreneurs were at the forefront. They not only knew how, but also where and when.

And now the Scots at Murray Johnstone have decided that the conditions are right for Murray Emerging Economies Trust PLC (MEET).

KNOW HOW

Six of our experienced fund managers currently manage over £300 million in emerging markets. Murray Smaller Markets Trust PLC, one of the trusts managed by Murray Johnstone, had a third of its assets invested in emerging markets at its last year end and was the best performing trust in the AITC International Capital Growth sector over 1.5 and 10 years to 31/8/94.*

KNOW WHERE

MEET will principally invest from Asia to Latin America in the 25 countries which are contained in the International Finance Corporation (IFC) Indices.

KNOW WHEN
Emerging markets' performance is shown below. The figures speak for themselves.

So far this year, emerging markets' performance hasn't reflected the continued underlying economic growth, and many emerging markets currently offer good value. It is also expected that there will be continued strong corporate earnings per share growth in emerging market countries.

So, for further information and to register for this opportunity, contact your financial adviser or call the number below. It is proposed that the offer runs from 9th to 29th November.

Cash and carry: Tim Hills hands over a cheque at his local NatWest drive-in bank in Lexden, Colchester

Just where did the drive-in banks go?

Nicola Cole and Liz Dolan recall banking fads of the Sixties and Seventies that never quite caught on Whatever happened to American-style drive-in banks? Or mobile banks that brought their business to your door like a milkman delivering milk? These are just two examples of past fads — forerunners of holes in the wall, telephone banking, and all the other more recent developments in the drive to accommodate busy, or remotely located, bank customers.

After an initial flurry of interest in the 1960s and 1970s, the progress of drive-in banks was initially stalled by traffic snarl-ups. Later on, technological developments such as automated teller machines (ATMs) and dial-a-bank services were perceived as more effective ways of tapping the demand for speedier banking. Recent moves to close and "merge" branches have done nothing for those who still prefer to visit their bank in person, however, and, where drive-ins remain, there is often still a demand for their services.

Tim Hills, a retired photographer, has been using his local NatWest drive-in, in Lexden, Colchester, since he moved to a house three miles down the road two years ago. During that period, he has had to get out of the car only once — to discuss a long and complicated document.

Why does he use it? "Quite simply because you can stay in the car. You have to get out if you want to use a hole in the wall. It's especially useful when it's cold, or wet. Okay, you might say, why not go to the bank when you're visiting other shops in town? But you often just want to use the bank without going anywhere else."

The service is fast. Mr Hills has never had to queue behind more than two cars. "You just draw up at the window and stop. There's usually someone there. If there isn't, you press a button and someone comes. Then, a tray comes sliding out of the wall, you put in your cheque book, card, paying-in slip, or whatever, and it slides back. They chuck in the money etc and slide it back to you. It's simple."

Westminster Bank, now part of National Westminster, opened Britain's first drive-in bank in Liverpool 35 years ago. Located in Princes Road, Toxteth, it was destroyed by fire in the 1982 riots. Now rebuilt, it offers a kerbside pull-up and cashier-operated slide-in/slide-out tray. It is heavily used by local firms for security reasons. "They don't have to walk here to deposit money," NatWest explains. The Toxteth branch is one of four NatWest drive-ins. The others are in Watford, Colchester and Gidea Park, Romford. Lloyds has two drive-in banks — at Aylesbury and High Wycombe, both in Buckinghamshire. The Royal Bank of Scotland used to have three. But two — in central London, and Fulwood, Lancashire — closed, owing to lack of demand and traffic problems. A third, at Leven, Fife, is still open.

The Midland has never operated drive-ins, dismissing them as "rather gimmicky". Instead, in addition to its First Direct telebanking arm, it operates "drive-outs", five mobile banks that serve 79 villages a week in Cornwall, Lincolnshire and Northamptonshire.

The vehicles, each weighing about 7½ tonnes, are operated by three staff. Alongside the conventional tills, there is a counselling area for customers with more complicated requirements.

Royal Bank of Scotland, operates 18 mobile banks, newly equipped with cash machines — and, in Scotland, a banking service that island flights. This succeeded a sailing cutter, skippered by "Britain's only bank manager with a peaked cap".

Are you too busy earning money to make money?

If you're working hard for your money, you may not have the time — or the expertise — to ensure that you're making the most of the amounts you can afford to save or invest.

The market is so broad and complicated that it would be a full-time job to explore it thoroughly — and the trouble is, you've already got one.

As a result, it's easy to miss out. You may be missing opportunities to save tax. You may have money in accounts which offer uncompetitive growth rates. Or equally, you may be putting your money at unnecessary and inappropriate risk.

When you've worked so hard to earn it in the first place, this can't be right. That's why, at Clerical Medical, we've introduced a new service specifically designed for busy professional people. It's called ProVision, and its purpose is to help you deal with the kind of long-term financial issues which it's all too easy to put off for another day — like maximising the return on your savings.

ProVision is not just a new service: it's a new kind of service. We've prepared a full information pack which spells out how it's different, and why it's better.

Trust is back again in small firms

Small is beautiful — and it's back with a vengeance. That, at least, is the verdict of two investment groups that this week brought out smaller companies funds which will seek out the corporate stars of tomorrow.

Singer & Friedlander's UK Emerging Leaders fund is launched today. The fund has a minimum investment of £1,000 and the shares are due to start trading in London and Dublin on November 7.

Singer & Friedlander has already caused a stir by appointing Terry Smith, one of the City's best-known investment analysts, to lead the fund's advisers.

Mr Smith is a partner of Collins Stewart, the stockbroking arm of Singer & Friedlander. He admits that, after the future over his best-selling Accounting for Growth, book he is often regarded as an analyst who has concentrated on large companies. But, he says: "I have followed smaller companies for years."

Robert Miller highlights a resurgence in smaller company funds

As the British economy picks up, the potential for the smaller companies' sector to outperform the bigger players becomes even greater.

One success story is that of David Welch whose sugar-free sweets innovation was made possible through the Entrust Business Growth Programme, financed by Tyneside Tec.

Generally speaking, Mr Smith says: "Between 1988 and 1992 smaller companies had a terrible time. But in the past 18 months they have outperformed the FT-SE 100 index of the UK's top companies."

But Mr Smith admits that picking winners is difficult because the smaller the companies, the harder it is to find in-depth research on them. He says, however: "The most important thing for investors to know is that we think it is more critical to avoid the losers. If they go under, they tend to lose 90 per cent to 100 per cent of their money. We are not bothered about picking fashionable sectors. We will pick each company on its individual merits."

To give investors a better understanding of smaller companies, Singer & Friedlander is giving away free copies of the Department of Trade & Industry's 60-page Small Firms in Britain Report 1994.

The other smaller companies newcomer is the product of Tilney, the stockbroking firm. Tilney has chosen to launch a UK Smaller Companies Trust, with a minimum investment of £500, to mark its debut in the unit trust business. The newcomer will invest in the bottom 10 per cent of the UK equity market by market capitalisation.

Jeremy McEntyre, the trust's manager, says: "Our research base in the North of England gives us a particular advantage against competing managers in the leading locations of London and Edinburgh. We have discovered that, because there is less research coverage, there is more opportunity to find undervalued stocks."

Smaller companies will also feature strongly in the new PC Aaron Master Portfolio Trust, launched this week by the David Aaron Partnership, a firm of independent financial advisers. This will invest in some 15 unit trusts run by other groups. It is expected to take in a number of smaller companies trusts, including Schroder Japan Smaller Companies and Hypo F&C US Smaller Companies. The firm offers a 20-minute video on the new trust, which costs £3.75 in Weekend Money readers, compared with the normal £7.50. Investors who put funds in the trust will have their purchase price refunded.

HOW TO BE AN ANGEL

YOU can now become a business angel and get a tax break. In last November's Budget, the Government borrowed the angels principle (a term associated with individuals who back theatrical productions with their own money) and wrapped it up with tax concessions to launch the Enterprise Investment Scheme (EIS). This was the replacement for Business Expansion Schemes. The EIS offers investors tax relief on sums put into certain types of unquoted companies, up to an investment limit of £100,000 in each tax year.

The scheme covers most kinds of unquoted companies, including those in manufacturing, services, construction, retailing and wholesale distribution. They can raise up to £1 million, but the money must be used in finance a business carried on wholly or mainly in the UK.

However, backing a single venture is much riskier than investing in unit or investment trusts, which spread your money between a wide range of companies.

Tax relief on EIS investments is at the lower 20 per cent rate of income tax. To qualify, you must hold the shares for at least five years, unless the company is wound up for genuine commercial reasons. If the shares are held for the full term, capital gains tax is not normally levied on profits.

If the sale of the shares gives rise to a loss, you can either deduct that loss, minus income tax relief already given, from taxable income — provided you make the claim within two years — or set the loss against chargeable gains for CGT purposes.

The minimum EIS investment under Inland Revenue rules is £500. However, it cannot be your own company. The rules say that you are "connected", or ineligible for tax relief, if, at any time in the qualifying term:

■ You or any associates, such as close relatives or business partners, are employed by the company or any of its subsidiaries.

■ You are a director of it and are entitled to any kind of payment.

There are exceptions. For instance, you may receive dividends or similar distributions, or payment for supplying goods.

A Revenue booklet, The Enterprise Investment Scheme, is free from tax offices or by writing to the Company Tax Division, West Wing, Somerset House, Strand, London WC2.

VENTURE CAPITAL TRUSTS

THE alternative to mainstream unit or investment trusts specialising in smaller companies is a venture, or development capital investment trust. According to the Association of Investment Trust Companies, there are about 27 trusts that qualify for this sector.

Unlike unit trusts, which are restricted in the number and type of unquoted companies in which they can invest, there are no such restrictions on investment trusts.

Among the best-known venture capital investment trust managers are Electra, Murray Johnstone, Foreign & Colonial, Ivory & Stone and Kleinwort Benson.

A number of these trusts offer low-cost monthly savings schemes, starting at about £50, as an alternative to putting in a lump sum. The latest addition to the list is 3i, whose shares were floated on the stock market this summer. The managers of 3i are planning to introduce a savings scheme in the near future.

These schemes provide a perfect solution for investors who want to add a little spice to their portfolio but do not want to commit too much money.

Next year, as part of the Government's plans to raise even more funds for start-up businesses from the private sector, a new breed of venture capital trusts will be available.

They will invest almost exclusively in unquoted companies and investors will be given special tax breaks by the Inland Revenue to invest in them.

Top up your company pension and enjoy your retirement.

To get the maximum pension available you normally have to be in the same company pension scheme for 40 years.

Even if you only change your job once, your pension may suffer a considerable fall.

Change your job several times and you might find you don't even have enough to retire on.

With The Equitable Life, you could make up the difference through Free-Standing Additional Voluntary Contributions - AVCs for short.

By making Free-Standing AVC contributions from your gross income you can top up your pension and look forward to retirement. Also through AVCs you currently receive tax relief at the highest rate which you pay.

Remember that the value of the tax relief available will depend on individual circumstances and that current legislation can change in the future.

In terms of premium income The Equitable Life is the biggest provider of corporate AVCs. It's very much the company that companies choose.

If you would like more information by post and by telephone, call Aylesbury (0296) 26226 or return the coupon below.

Schroders. Who better in Japan?

As an experienced investor, you are probably aware that the Japanese stockmarket has only recently begun to rise. In fact, the Nikkei 225 is currently trading at just over half the level of its all time high in 1989*.

We believe this is an ideal time to invest. As signs of economic recovery become ever more apparent, so the confidence of domestic and foreign investors grows. It is our opinion that their money will cause Japan's market rally to accelerate, producing the potential for exciting returns.

But who can you trust with your Japanese investments?

Schroders have over £4 billion invested in Japanese equities on behalf of those who already know about our expertise. £800 million is invested in our Japanese unit trusts. Little wonder, when our funds in Japan achieve such excellent investment performance. Take our Tokyo Fund, first in its sector since launch in February 1981; and our Japanese Smaller Companies Fund, the top fund in its sector over 5, 7 and 10 years.

Who should you trust? Who better than Schroders?

Courted with cashbacks

An all-too familiar sight in the current buyers' market

If you are planning to take out a mortgage before the end of the year, you can count on being courted with discounts, cashbacks and fixed rates by lenders desperate to attract buyers who will complete by Christmas.

It is still a buyers' market. The monthly house price index published by both the Halifax and Nationwide building societies this week indicates that the housing market remains in the doldrums. But the cost of loans has risen slightly after last month's base rate rise. New fixed rates are higher, reflecting the higher cost to lenders of buying fixed-rate funds in the money markets. Discounted rates are also increasing. To offset this, lenders are offering cashbacks and reductions on initial fees to dull the pain of buying.

■ Birmingham Midshires has a "fee-free" discount mortgage. It will refund the standard valuation fee of £125 in full when you complete. There is no arrangement fee, which could save borrowers several hundred pounds. If borrowers choose a solicitor for their conveyancing from an approved panel, it will waive the fee. If borrowers want to choose their own solicitor, Birmingham Midshires will pay you £200 on completion. On top of this, the society is offering a 1.5 per cent discount off its standard variable rate, currently 8.15 per cent, until November 1, 1997. This cuts the rate to 6.65 per cent. But if rates rise, the discounted rate follows.

■ Yorkshire Building Society is guaranteeing not to put up its discounted rate before June 1995 even if the variable mortgage rate rises. This will protect borrowers from the effect of further base rate rises for a year. It is offering a 4 per cent discount on its standard variable rate of 8.14 per cent for one year, or a 1.35 per cent discount for three years. This gives borrowers a guaranteed rate of 4.14 per cent, or 6.79 per cent until next June. There is a £50 arrangement fee.

Borrowers may also choose to fix rates over one, two and three years. The cost of the three-year fix, to October 1997, has risen from 7.2 per cent to 7.95 per cent. The society also has a range of more expensive fixed-rate loans for borrowers who want to take up an offer of £400 cashback on completion. The three-year rate, with cashback, is 8.35 per cent.

■ Barclays Bank has four new fixed rates, all higher than its previous ones. Existing borrowers moving house, or moving their mortgages to Barclays, are offered a fixed rate of 8.45 per cent until January 1, 1997. If they take buildings and contents cover with Barclays, the rate is reduced to 7.99 per cent. Previously, the bank had a fixed rate of 6.99 per cent until January 1997. Customers remortgaging can fix their rate at 8.1 per cent until February 1996, or 8.99 per cent until February 1997.

■ Royal Bank of Scotland has launched what it claims is the first "continuous cashback" mortgage in the country. It will pay the borrower the equivalent of the first regular mortgage payment, up to a £1,000 limit, each year during the life of the mortgage. On a £50,000 mortgage, this continuous cashback would be worth just over £300 in the first year, amounting to £7,558 over 25 years.

Centralised lenders are back — but can you trust them?

says borrowers must look at a lender's track record

After a respite from the mortgage market, some of the centralised lenders have started lending again. National Home Loans and First Mortgage Securities have already taken the plunge. In January, they will be joined by Mortgage Trust.

Centralised lenders rely on funding from the City. They have lower overheads because they do not have a branch network and sell through other parties such as mortgage brokers, insurance companies and estate agents.

Some have had a poor press. They have been in and out of the mortgage market, left borrowers stranded on high rates and a number are for sale. However, they are not all bad and if you check them out they can be more flexible, innovative and cheaper. They offer mortgages only and compulsory insurance is not a prerequisite for a discounted mortgage. They usually have lower or no redemption fees and several offer loyalty bonuses for good payers.

But do not be tempted by cheap rates: look for track launch of Homeloans Direct. Its variable rate is a competitive 7.95 per cent when building society rates average just over 8 per cent and it has a fixed rate of 7.99 per cent for three years. To help you to pay off the mortgage more quickly, it has an index-linked repayment plan where the payment rises with inflation.

First Mortgage Securities was relaunched in February after a management buyout and its current rate is 6.75 per cent. But there is a catch. Its limit on loans is £150,000 and you must be a second-time buyer with a 25 per cent deposit. If you always pay on time, it will give you a loyalty bonus every five years to cut the capital outstanding.

A telephone mortgage service has been launched by First Mortgage Securities which will give loan approval in ten to 15 minutes subject to references and valuations.

UCB's Enterprise mortgage is for the self-employed who are unable to provide accounts. Loans are up to 75 per cent and the current rate is 6.99 per cent fixed for one year.

record. How do their rates compare with other lenders over the long term? Who is the parent company? How long have they been in the market and has it been continuous? Generally, those with backing from a large parent, such as Citibank Mortgage, owned by Citibank, and UCB, a subsidiary of Compagnie Bancaire, a French bank, are in a stronger position because they have access to the owner's treasury operation. For example, The Mortgage Business, part of the Bank of Scotland group, has always been close to the Halifax's rate. After a gap of three years, National Home Loans has returned to the market with the Death begins at 40.

Did your father aim to change the family car at around 30,000 miles? People used to think that this was when things started to go wrong. Nowadays, cars tend to be a lot more reliable. What about ourselves?

For us, the figures are quite clear. Things start to go wrong at about 40. That's when the incidence of cancer, heart attack and stroke begins to climb.

Thanks to modern medicine, even serious illnesses like these can often be treated. You're likely to be passing your MOT test for years to come. It's the effect on your income that could well be terminal.

COUNTING THE COST.

One in seven 40-year olds will suffer a heart attack or cancer before the age of 60. If you're one of them, what will happen when you recover?

You may well need to find a less stressful job. You'll have to take things easy. You'll need to build a new life for yourself and your family — doing something different, maybe even living somewhere else.

You need money to make changes like that. It's not just a question of income — you need capital, not least to pay off your mortgage.

There is a kind of insurance which provides exactly this. Critical illness insurance pays out a guaranteed cash sum when a serious illness is diagnosed.

It has two main drawbacks. First, it has tended to be expensive — for the good, if rather depressing, reason that a lot of people need to make claims on it. And second, it is not very well understood.

At Scottish Amicable European, we've solved both of these problems. Our new Flexible Critical Illness Plan makes cover more affordable, because it uses the tax advantages of our European base to keep premiums well below average — up to 25% lower, in some cases.

And to help you understand the benefits more fully, we have produced a free Guide to Critical Illness, which explains how the insurance works and how it fits in with your overall financial planning.

For your free copy of our useful guide, get in touch now. Talk to your financial adviser, return the coupon or call us, free, on the number below.

Bondage without the premiums

From C.F. McKenna
Sir, I read your article on Premium Bonds (Weekend Money, October 1) with much interest. I must agree with the large number of bond holders who do not agree that each bond has an equal chance in the present system. I have held a small book of bonds since October 1959, some 35 years, and have won nothing. I assume my bonds have disappeared into the ether regions. On several occasions, I have considered the withdrawal of these bonds, but the ever optimistic side of my nature says that £200 buys very little these days and, with my obvious lack of luck, would probably come up the next draw after withdrawal. I can but sit back and envy those poor souls who only win "one prize every three or four months". Maybe I should be grateful for small mercies. Thanks again for an enlightening article.

Yours sincerely,
C.F. McKenna,

Not so dear diary

From M. J. C. Gunner
Sir, There has been much reference to the large profits, and high payments made to those in authority in industry, and not least in banking. I therefore bring to your attention the fact that consideration is given to the staff and pensioners, and I quote from the letter (dated September 1994) of the chairman of the National Westminster Group Pensioners Association as follows: "I commence this Newsletter with the news that, to mark the 25 years' existence of National Westminster plc, staff and pensioners who retired with an immediate pension are to be provided with a diary for 1995. It is hoped that these will be dispatched during November of this year."

One is led to wonder how the bank can possibly afford such generosity.
Yours faithfully,
M. J. C. GUNNER,
Cottills, Cottles Lane,

Exeter.

WEEKEND MONEY LETTERS

Keep the pressure on Government for multilateral debt reform

From Melanie Jarman
Sir, "Lamb takes on banking lions" (Weekend Money, October 1) highlighted the effectiveness of a campaign linking local-based action - changing your bank account - to putting pressure on decision-makers at an international level. By highlighting how each individual has a responsibility in putting ethical and environmental issues on a corporation's agenda, Lamb demonstrates how action at a grassroots level can contribute towards social change. However this campaign against commercial involvement in the Third World debt crisis needs to be complemented by equally decisive action on a multilateral scale. Since 1982, the stock of multilateral debt owed by severely indebted low-income countries has quadrupled to over $43 billion. Servicing that debt alone accounts for over a quarter of total debt repayments of these countries, diverting payments from an attempt to rebuild their economies and eradicate poverty.

This situation is not just a burden on the people of the developing world, but as repayments to the IMF are increasingly met by a diversion of assistance from countries such as Britain, we are affected both as taxpayers and

FROM PHIL YATES
IN DUBAI

IT WAS impossible to escape the assumption that involvement in hard-fought semi-finals on Thursday had blunted the competitive edge of Alan McManus and Peter Ebdon as they went into the concluding session of the Dubai Duty Free snooker Classic final level at 4-4 here yesterday.

McManus had produced a high standard during a 6-4 semi-final victory over Stephen Hendry, the world champion, while Ebdon had provided evidence of his recuperative powers in recovering from 2-4 to beat Ronnie O'Sullivan, the United Kingdom champion, by the same score. With both players hitting peak form simultaneously, a memorable final was expected, but, in the opening session, at least, the quality of the exchanges was surprisingly low.

McManus had won two of his three meetings with Ebdon. However, Ebdon correctly pointed out that, in a qualifying round for the 1993 European Open, he made a record four century breaks in overcoming McManus 5-3. Certainly the burden of pressure was on McManus, unsuccessful on three previous appearances in the final of a world-ranking event. Although he captured the Benson and Hedges Masters title in February, the general feeling was that he still had plenty to prove.

McManus, the world No 6, succeeded in frustrating Ebdon in the early stages by using the percentage snooker tactics he had abandoned in favour of a more attacking philosophy against Hendry. A last red-to-pink clearance gave McManus a scrappy first frame and breaks of 49 and 44 in the following two helped him to lead 3-0.

Even though McManus led, he had not played with great authority and it was no surprise that, with a 98 break in the fourth frame — easily the highest of the session — Ebdon brought about a swing in momentum.

Ebdon, the world No 10, won the next two frames in unconvincing style while McManus began to look suspect. A 45 break guaranteed McManus the lead again at 4-3 but Ebdon ensured an interval impasse by winning the eighth frame comfortably.

While Ebdon and McManus battled for the title, Hendry, who had been a strong favourite to win in Dubai for the fourth time in the event's six-year history, returned home insisting that he is unconcerned about his inconsistent early-season results.

Hendry, winner of the Top Rank Classic in Thailand last month, is playing patchily. His normally devastating long potting is not working well and he is prone to lapses in concentration. These are the two main problems he will be seeking to solve in the Snooker grand prix, which begins in Derby on Monday.

Ebdon: unconvincing

FROM COLIN MCQUILLAN IN ST PETER PORT

A DAY that began as an oddity, with all four quarter-finals in the world open squash championship here offering England-Australia confrontations, blossomed into extraordinary home success yesterday when Fiona Geaves, the No 8 seed, went through 9-7, 2-9, 9-3, 0-9, 9-7 in 55 minutes against the second seed, Liz Irving, to join Cassandra Jackman in a semi-final that guarantees an English finalist on Sunday.

With the British champion, Suzanne Horner, due to meet Sarah FitzGerald, and Sue Wright, the England No 3, from Kent, playing Michelle Martin, the holder, later in the evening, the victories might even have been merely the start of a splendid day for English women's squash.

The memory returned to male success last month in the world open championship in Barcelona, when Peter Marshall and Peter Nicol carried British colours to a similar level in the game's premier tournament.

Jackman's result yesterday fulfilled her fourth seeding, but she was insistent after defeating the sixth-seeded Carol Owens that she would not relax on that achievement. "I am playing well here and the court suits my game," Jackman, 21, the former world junior champion, from Norfolk, said. "I am to reach the final. Then it is all a matter of who plays best on the day."

Jackman was unconcerned before Geaves's unexpected win about who reached her semi-final. "I always liked the look of this draw. I have beaten Liz this season and I have never lost to Fiona," referee, Graham Horrex, seemed to take the concentration of the English player and, with Owens astutely stepping up the pace, Jackman lost the game. Again in the third game, at 4-1, the referee decided that a difficult pick-up by Jackman in the top left-hand corner was down on the tin. She promptly lost four points in a row, but this time recovered to control the important rallies.

Jackman seemed relaxed and confident in the fourth game, completing a 9-6, 3-9, 9-5, 9-1 victory, and her prospects of reaching the final must be strong against an England No 8 who she has dominated since their junior days.

Geaves, however, is on a rising curve at 26, having reached the British Open quarter-finals for the first time last April. "Recently I have been working with Phil Taylor, the manager of my club at Riverside, in Gloucester, to improve concentration and sustained aggression. It seems to be working."

She had some good fortune yesterday in that Irving, 29, from Brisbane, arrived at the court with her lower back in spasm after a chance displacement while walking home the previous evening. "I considered not playing," Irving said. "But I'm glad I did. I thought I almost could have won it."

Certainly, in the fourth game of this tense battle, all Irving's determination and experience were on display. But the new levels of concentration and determination that have raised the Gloucester player's game this year were equally evident in the fifth game when Geaves imposed her favourite lob-and-drop pattern of play on the match.

Duthie ready to outwit familiar foe

JAMES Duthie, who spent 15 years playing hockey for Southgate and is now the player-coach of Surbiton, is out to defeat his former club at Sugden Road tomorrow and keep his team on top of the national league (Sydney Friskin writes).

Six weeks before the 1996 World Cup, Duthie broke a leg while training with the national squad at Bisham Abbey and was deprived of the silver medal that England eventually won. After retiring from the international scene in 1989 he spent three years helping to coach the England Under-18 team but recently resigned from the Hockey Association's technical committee to concentrate on his new duties at Surbiton.

For the match tomorrow, Surbiton will field a full squad with the return of Francis and Gorman. Both were unavailable last week when Surbiton beat Reading 4-2 to go top of the table.

"We were nervous at the start because we had not been in this position before but our win has given us confidence," Duthie added. He also holds the view that Southgate will be a much better side once their corners start to work.

Stourport's fortunes have dwindled since a 1-1 draw with Havant at the beginning of the season; but they hope to get the balance against Old Loughtonians at Chigwell. In last year's match, a goal three minutes from time enabled Old Loughtonians to force a 1-1 draw and Richard Lee, Stourport's captain, expects another exciting finish tomorrow.

"We have let in a lot of soft goals and failed to put away our chances and we have paid dearly," he said. But with the younger players becoming stronger he expects a better performance in the next match. In particular, he praised the talent of Parnham, at right half. Three tried and trusted hands, White, Knott and Sherwin, make up the attack.

Old Loughtonians, unbeaten in four matches, are also persevering with younger players — Jenkins, Billy Williams, Robinson and Cooper. However, among the older players, Kristman, Nick Thompson and Gladman are there to get the goals. Seaton, their regular goalkeeper, is replaced by Ford.

Havant, the champions, entertain Trojans in a local derby. Cannock's unbeaten record will be threatened at home by Reading but Indian Gymkhana, the remaining unbeaten side, can expect maximum points on their visit to Hull.

Marathon effort helps to foster wheelchair sport

BY ALIX RAMSEY

IT IS Friday morning at Cardiff Arms Park. A couple of the Welsh rugby union side stroll on the famous turf. For them it is a home from home. But for once they are not the focus of attention.

Rupert Moon and Mike Hall, together with their coach, Alan Davies, and manager, Robert Norster, are there to help six wheelchair athletes on their way on the latest leg of an 820-mile push around Britain.

This journey covers 50 miles between Cardiff and Swansea and the team is led by Tanni Grey and Chris Hallam, both of whom have won the London Wheelchair Marathon and are Paralympic gold medal winners. They are part of a squad of 50 athletes who will complete the 20-day trek around the country as part of the Steel Wheels Can Challenge. They began last Sunday in London and will finish on October 28 in Middleburgh.

The push is backed by British Steel, which has donated a sizeable sum to the British Wheelchair Sports Foundation (BWSF), the idea behind the venture being to promote wheelchair sport and can recycling.

Everyone in Britain uses, on average, 220 steel cans a year. And 220 cans, if recycled, provide enough steel to make a wheelchair. With the money guaranteed plus a possible £10,000 bonus if enough members of the public pledge to recycle their cans, the whole event has come as a lifeline for the BWSF.

The foundation is based at Stoke Mandeville at the Sir Ludwig Guttmann Sports Centre, known worldwide as the home of wheelchair sport. Guttmann was a surgeon at the Stoke Mandeville spinal injuries unit and used sport as rehabilitation for his patients. Gradually the sport took greater prominence.

But at Stoke Mandeville the future is not looking bright. As the sport has grown so has the expense and the sports centre is in dire financial trouble. After a busy year of international events sending British teams around the world to compete, it is struggling to survive. To get out of present difficulties it needs around £60,000. The British Steel donation will go a long way towards that — but that is only the tip of the iceberg.

The sports centre is open to the paying — and able-bodied — public and it relies on that income to pay the bills. But with the maintenance of the 25-year-old buildings, increasing overheads and the ever-growing number of athletes needing travelling and training grants, the income no longer covers the expenditure. In the past we could use the BWSF funds to cover the costs, but now our capital has gone and we need more money."

The Steel Wheels Can Challenge hotline is on 071 379 1306. Every call pledged to recycle cans raises 10p for the BWSF and Stoke Mandeville Sports Centre.

Martin McElhatton, of BWSF, said: "We need to find £1 million to have enough capital to provide us with an income to be self-sufficient." Ironically, finding grants for big projects has not been a problem at present: the centre is building a new snooker hall thanks to funding from the Foundation for Sport and the Arts. It is the day-to-day costs that are ruining the centre and in a recession the charitable donations are drying up. "We are living from hand to mouth, which is not ideal. We need to be able to plan ahead for the sake of the athletes," McElhatton said.

"The timing of the British Steel push round Britain could not be better. It is publicising the cause and bringing in money. We are exploring every avenue to keep the sports centre open. It would be a tragedy if we had to close."

Torn sail causes setback for Hall

BY BARRY PICKTHALL

JOSH Hall, the British skipper who is labouring to keep pace with the leaders in the BOC Challenge solo round-the-world yacht race, ran into problems with the sails on his 60-footer, Gartmore Investment Managers, yesterday.

Hall reported: "Bad news. I'm afraid. This morning, my mainsail split just below the headboard at the top of the sail. I have had to lower it for repairs but cannot carry these out until the wind eases, which could be another 24 hours or so."

The Ipswich-based sailor already trails Isabelle Autissier's leading French yacht, Ecuireil Poitou-Charente 2, by more than 700 miles on this first stage of the race to Cape Town and could well have done without being hindered by further delays.

Another competitor in trouble is the third-placed South African, J.J. Pringle, who reported yesterday that cracks had appeared in the bows of his yacht, Ben Vie.

"I am leaking a little and my concern is whether the position will worsen if we sail upwind for several days, which is likely. If I don't go to windward, there should be no problem, but then I may as well stop racing," he said forlornly.

Autissier crossed the Equator on Wednesday and holds a 300-mile lead over Jean-Luc van den Heede's French entry, Vendée Enterprises, and Giovanni Soldini's Italian boat, Kodak, continues to lead Class 2 by almost 400 miles.

Australia well placed after enforcing follow-on in second Test

FROM MICHAEL HENDERSON IN RAWALPINDI

IMAGINE a beast with 11 arms and one head, which it sheds each year, to be replaced by another. Roused, the beast is capable of anger. Left to graze, it is pitifully submissive. Nobody can predict its behaviour or judge its moods accurately. Such a beast exists: it is called the Pakistan cricket team.

It is virtually impossible to make any sense of its variations of performance. It appeared to be seriously wounded here yesterday as the Australians enforced the follow-on after taking a lead of 261. The touring team start the fourth day of this second Test match overwhelmed favourites to win it and they thoroughly deserve it.

If there is anything more humiliating than following on, it is being instructed to do so after you have won the toss. Salim Malik's judgment looked foolish on the first morning and it does not look any better now. Only once before have Pakistan followed on in their own country, against West Indies in 1958. At this rate the beast will sprout another head before long.

As an example of a complete shambles, Pakistan's first innings is hard to match. They passed 100 in the 23rd over with one wicket down yet they were bowled out for just 260 on a benign pitch. Aamir Sohail alone scored more than 50. No fewer than six players contributed to their departure through numbskull batting. Resolution there was none. This was a hopeless effort.

The Australians deserve every commendation. They stuck at their task, kept their heads up and would have improved their day in Pakistan's second innings had Warner not dropped Aamir at deep square leg. It was not one of Warner's better days, although he did hold a superb catch at gully to dismiss Mushtaq.

That catch gave McDermott a fourth wicket and he had earned them all. There were also four for Damien Fleming in his first Test and it would have been five if Warner had held a difficult chance off Salim. Mark Taylor juggled his bowlers effectively and the Umpires: A E Leesonberg (South Africa) and Mahboob Shah (Pakistan).

Fielders always looked alert. In terms of attitude — an over-used word but in this case an apt one — the teams could not be further apart.

Fleming's figures show beyond argument that he passed his test of temperament. There is something of Steve Waugh in his splay-footed approach and he bowls at a similar pace with a high arm, achieving movement both ways through the air. His first Test wicket was Zahid Fazal. His second, also bowled, was more important in the context of this innings. Aamir made 80 breathless runs from 82 balls, and was eager for more, when he attacked a ball that swung past his bat to uproot the off stump.

It was reckless batting by an opener who is nothing if not a chancer. Aamir has a wide range of strokes but his reluctance to move his feet always gives the bowler a chance. At 119 for two, the game was even-stevens. Aamir's aberration established the indiscriminate tone that others were happy to ape.

Australia probably thought they had to hit the stumps to get anyone out. Mahboob Shah refused five appeals for leg-before and when he did give Aamir Malik out, it seemed a compensatory decision for turning McDermott down the over before. The umpire put his finger up again for Waqar later in the innings but that was not a brave act.

In fact, there was no real moral courage. Salim played on to McDermott, trying to force Inzamam heaved wildly across the line and Mushtaq, so grumpy in a winning cause last Sunday, held his bat out. Rashid's wicket belonged to Slater, who made ground swiftly from extra cover to scoop a wonderful low catch at full stretch, diving forward — the most difficult sort of all.

Nothing denoted the utter lack of understanding in the Pakistan team as much as the last wicket. Mohsin was run out by Steve Waugh's long throw from mid-wicket after he got his signals crossed with Wasim, who registered his disgust in an emphatic manner.

Rivals hope to tempt Herbert from Lotus

AFTER all the speculation surrounding David Coulthard's possible move to another motor racing team for the last three races of the Formula One season, attention switched yesterday to the likelihood that Johnny Herbert, the highly regarded Lotus driver, may be persuaded away by a rival for the European, Japanese and Australian Grands Prix (Olivier Holt writes). McLaren and Benetton have made previous efforts to sign Herbert, who has grown gradually disillusioned with Lotus after a series of poor performances. Those approaches have been rejected by Peter Collins, the team's managing director, but Lotus, who are beset by financial problems, went into administration a fortnight ago and their administrator may be more receptive to a deal if he has the power to sanction the arrangement. Benetton and McLaren are again thought to be the interested parties.

Manchester's first event

CRICKET: Surrey have signed Nadeem Shahid, the Essex batsman, on a two-year contract. Shahid, 25, who had a disappointing summer, scored 2,962 runs for Essex, having made his debut in 1989. Jeremy Batty, the Yorkshire off spinner, who made only three senior appearances last season, is moving to Somerset.

Tigers continue to fight

BASKETBALL: Thames Valley Tigers will continue to take on some of the best clubs on the Continent despite their elimination from the European championship on Thursday. After losing 160-138 over two legs to Buckle Bologna, the Tigers now enter the European Cup, an event for clubs knocked out in the early rounds of the championships.

Aces high for Becker

TENNIS: Boris Becker, unleashed 21 aces in 12 service games to overpower Jonathan Stark, the unseeded American, 7-6, 6-3 and reach the semi-finals of the Australian indoor championships in Sydney yesterday. □ Nottingham will host a pre-Wimbledon men's grass-court event next year, the Lawn Tennis Association has confirmed.

India tour goes ahead

CRICKET: The West Indies board of control yesterday gave its approval for the tour of India to go ahead after a week's delay because of the pneumonic plague epidemic there. The original itinerary has been revised, reducing the number of one-day internationals against India from six to five, but the rest of the schedule remains unaltered.

Pritchard-Gordon lands amateurs' title

BY RICHARD EVANS RACING CORRESPONDENT

PADDY Pritchard-Gordon yesterday added a new twist to the age-old Corinthian principle that taking part matters more than winning when he collected the Bollinger Champagne Challenge for gentlemen riders, despite finishing out of the frame in the final race of the series at Ascot.

The 19-year-old son of Gavin Pritchard-Gordon, the recently retired Newmarket trainer, could do no better than fourth on Acting Brave, behind the Martin Pipe-trained Seasonal Splendour, but, with his nearest rivals failing to win, he deservedly retained his lead in the competition.

Pritchard-Gordon had led virtually from the start of the season after winning on Daring King, trained by his father, at Folkestone in April. "Dad set me up at the beginning of the season with a winner, a second and a fourth and I was determined to really go for it," he said.

The only way he could have lost the series yesterday was if Andrew Balding, son of the Kinsclore trainer, Ian, had won on Hill Of Dreams, which he ultimately faded into fifth place. They were both at Radley, where they each ran the school's racing club, and are now both at Cirencester Agricultural College on a business and equine studies course.

"I saw Andrew leading before turning into the straight and I feared the worst but in the end it worked out. Pritchard-Gordon said. "What a day. I am absolutely thrilled."

Paddy, whose brother, Rupert, is an assistant to Criquelette Head in France, is keen to get a job in racing when he leaves college, although he is undecided whether to become a trainer.

"Training has crossed my mind and one of the reasons for going to Cirencester is to think about it. I certainly want to do something in the racing industry."

One thing is sure. He will not lack for advice. Apart from his mother and father, who are both closely involved with the sport, his uncle, Grant Pritchard-Gordon, is racing manager to Khaled Abdulla, owner of the horse he rode yesterday.

Bollinger Champagne confirmed it would continue with the series for gentlemen amateur riders in 1995 with the final again being staged at Ascot next October. "The series seems to have struck the right note and we are thrilled with it," Anthony Mallaby, the managing director, said. "We are delighted to continue in 1995."

□ Sir Nicholas Beaumont ends a 30-year association with Ascot racecourse when he officiates for the last time today. The clerk of the course since 1969, he is retiring to return to his native North Essex, where he is to become the director of racing at Newmarket racecourse.

Saturday portrait: Colin Montgomerie by John Hopkins, golf correspondent

Warming to giant who plays like an angel but struggles for love

Many questions surround Colin Montgomerie: Just how good is he? How has he become so good so quickly? Why does he get into more scrapes than a Tory politician? Is he a Scot or merely a carpet-bagger? Is he as bad-tempered as he sometimes looks? Should he lose weight? Why can a man who plays golf like a saint still be regarded as a sinner?

Everyone knows that golf is a funny, paradoxical game. To get a golf ball up into the air you must hit down on it. To hit it further, you must swing more slowly. To hit a stationary golf ball is more difficult than hitting a moving hockey or tennis ball. Montgomerie fits perfectly into a sport apparently riddled with contradictions.

He is intelligent, articulate, well educated and a brilliant golfer, ranked eighth in the world. He is capable of winning major championships. Not the least of his advantages is that he has married a calm and sensible lady named Elinor, and she can handle him. All in all, now that Sandy Lyle appears to have gone into irreversible decline, Scots should be doing Highland flings at the pelt-mell, upward dash of another of their own.

The reality is that all these enormities do not amount to a hill of beans. Montgomerie just does not cut the mustard in the way that Sam Torrance and Lyle do. Many Scots regard him with little more affection than they do Elizabeth I or Margaret Thatcher.

As a golfer, Montgomerie has come on faster than Nick Faldo, Bernhard Langer and Ian Woosnam. He won the order of merit in 1993, only six full seasons after turning professional, and now he is poised to become the first man since Sandy Lyle in 1979 and 1980 to repeat the feat. He leads by £148,070 from Seve Ballesteros. Although Ballesteros is undergoing an enormous revival and has climbed from 164th in the order of merit on May 1 to second, and José María Olazábal is only 1991 behind Ballesteros, Montgomerie is favourite. Only two events remain.

So just how good can Montgomerie become? Can he match the achievements of Lyle, the best golfer to have emerged from Scotland since the War, if you accept that a man who was born in the Royal Salop Infirmary in Shrewsbury, and is as much a Shropshire Lad as the central figure of Housman's poem, can be called Scottish? Lyle's golden years, when he won the 1985 Open and the 1988 Masters and a host of other events besides, set a stern target for Montgomerie.

Yet Montgomerie should win one major championship and could win more. He is 20 yards longer now than he used to be because he is more confident, and he is as straight a hitter as there is. He has a deft short game, as so many big men have had down the years, and he puts beautifully. Such is his confidence that he rarely practises. He is, as the French say, content in his skin, albeit that in some eyes there is rather too much of that skin.

His greatest ally may not be his clubs, nor his swing, nor his ability to turn three shots into two around the greens, nor roll in put after put, but his own self-belief. In short, he has enough game to compete around the world with Olazábal, Ernie Els and the other stars of the new generation for another ten years. But the question remains, will he?

And another thing: Why is it that such an intelligent and personable man, who is so delicate with a golf club, can be so clumsy and bad-tempered without it? Is it fair to suggest that he remains the gauche, grumpy figure that he was? An air of combustibility as strong as a magnetic field surrounds the man. But it behoves those of us who have charted his misdeeds, as well as his triumphs, to note that there are signs of a levelling in the barometric scale that is Montgomerie's fuse. At times this year, Montgomerie has discussed questions about his temper and his image with a smile on his face. This suggests he has begun the process that may eventually conclude with the banishment of the demons of bad manners and gracelessness that torment him from time to time.

All credit to him, after his disappointing performance in the play-off for the US Open in Pennsylvania last June, that he dismissed questioners with flashes of humour. At a time when he might have been forgiven for over-heating — it was, after all, well up in the 90s — he cooled a potentially difficult interrogation with a pun on the words hot-headed.

Another question: why is it that Montgomerie is respected while Sam Torrance, a fellow Scot, is loved? Torrance does not stand on ceremony. He is clearly a man of the people. He must be. He rolls his own cigarettes. He places his pencil behind his right ear, like a chippie's apprentice. He likes his beer, his "baccy", his snooker, his darts and his betting. His manner is as down to earth as a Highland farmer's, his voice as gravelly as Taggart's. He is a folk hero in his own country — even though he lives in Wentworth and votes Tory, for heaven's sake.

Among Scots, Montgomerie enjoys nothing like the same status. He has the air of a man with his eyes on distant, greater horizons. For Scots, there could be few more popular winners of the Open than Torrance, yet the reality is that Montgomerie, 31 last June, is much more likely to do so than Torrance, who was 41 last August. Is it that Torrance appears not to care — though he does — whereas Montgomerie appears to care too much, the unpardonable British sin? Or is it that Montgomerie, who was born in Glasgow, has chosen to live not just in England but in the London area, and that in appearance, demeanour and dress he appears to be a toff, more English than Scottish?

Is it his middle-class background, his public school education? It has done Tony Blair no harm that he went to Fettes College in Edinburgh. Should Montgomerie's time at Strathallan, near Perth, really be held against him?

All Britain and Ireland, and not just England, rejoiced when Tony Jacklin burst through to win the 1969 Open at Royal Lytham and the US Open 11 months later. Welsh and Irish golf followers — and a good many English, because they, too, regard him as one of their own — as well as Scots applauded Lyle's major championship victories. And the sight of Woosnam punching the air after hoisting the winning putt at Augusta in 1991 united us all.

In the aftermath of such deeds, you wanted to embrace Lyle, Jacklin and Woosnam, to take them to the pub and buy them a beer. For these men you would do anything, including forgiving them a drink-driving conviction (Woosnam) and a fling with a waitress (Jacklin). There is no similar pent-up desire to hug Big Monty, take him to his local and ply him with drink, laughing at his stories far into the night. Why not? Why is it that Woosnam, who was born in England and now lives in Jersey, has been taken to the bosom of every Westman, while the Scotland-born and patriotic Montgomerie seems unable to capture the hearts and minds and support of those who hail from the home of golf?

So many questions, so few answers. But perhaps there are no answers. Montgomerie plays golf like an angel. One last question: Shall we leave it at that?

Defence the best form of attack for Wigan against Australians

By CHRISTOPHER IRVINE

CLUB against country is usually an uneven struggle, except when that club is Wigan and the bulk of the Great Britain team makes up the side. The televised encounter today against a virtual international-strength Australia, the hors-d'oeuvre for the main course at Wembley in two weeks, will give early warning of any shift in the power balance.

One Sydney commentator, revelling in the pounding Leeds took from the Australians in midweek, informed his listeners that English rugby league was down on its knees. The early evidence of two record scores and 100 points is that this eighteenth Kangaroo squad is another with the potential for greatness. However, raising the flag over the British body is a premature.

Wigan are unlikely to lie down as conveniently as Cumbria and Leeds. As defence is undoubtedly the best form of attack against Australia, Wigan will look to a repeat of the awesome tackling that absorbed nearly everything Brisbane Broncos threw at them in the World Club Challenge match in June.

Watching Australia's flat back line tearing Leeds to shreds, Graeme West, the Wigan coach, observed: "You're not going to stop this lot unless you tackle and tackle some more." Wigan, not surprisingly, stand between Australia and a likely swathe being cut through club opponents.

Wigan's triumph in Brisbane showed that the Australian power could be resisted. Their victory has since been portrayed in Australia as an irrelevance against a team past its best, but Bobby Fulton, the Australia coach, did not play down its significance.

"They showed just how good they are against Brisbane and why they have been Britain's dominant side for five years now," he said. "We know this is the fourth test in all but name." With a few exceptions, the players will confront one another in the opening John Smith's International. Gaining a psychological advantage is enough of an incentive before Wembley.

Offiah: fiery clash

Losing, too, can play its part in the learning process, and whatever the outcome, Billy Hanley, the Britain coach, will get a number of pointers before naming his 19-man squad on Monday. Wigan's switching of Gary Connolly to full back, a position he filled with distinction in Brisbane, could solve one conundrum.

If Shaun Edwards, fit again after a thigh injury, can outplay Ricky Stuart at scrum half, the temptation to move him to stand-off to accommodate Bobby Goulding must be resisted. Dick Best, the former England rugby union coach, said yesterday that Edwards is probably the best half back of either code in the country. To play such a visionary player out of his regular position could invite disaster.

His and Stuart's is one of several fascinating head-to-head clashes. That between Mal Meninga and Vataiga Tuigamala in the centre, offers the most raw-boned confrontation, while that between Martin Offiah and Michael Hancock should produce fireworks. The Wigan back row of Betts, Farrell and Clarke is the starting combination Hanley probably has in mind, but a three-match suspension yesterday of Sonny Nickle, of St Helens, for a high tackle at Oldham last weekend, has limited one of Hanley's options for the four substitute positions.

It is essential that Kelvin Skerrett makes an impression at prop after missing three games with a fractured cheekbone. His opposite number is London-born Ian Roberts, who became a naturalised Australian the day before the party left and played 20 times for Wigan in the 1986-87 season. With doubts over the fitness of Lazarus, he can stake his international claim.

There is no danger of Australia underestimating Wigan. The key for the home side will be in containment and something slowing the Australians' relentless movement at the rucks. Meninga, his outstanding old self at Headingley, said: "This will be our toughest test to date. I think it will be a fair yardstick for how we are going in preparation for the series."

Wigan were overwhelmed in 1990, and Australia have won their last four meetings. Since taking over in May, West has enjoyed a 100 per cent success rate, but as the Kangaroos have already shown, the record book is there to be torn up.

Happell's triumph forms cup landmark

By SALLY JONES

MANDY Happell, of Australia, became the first woman to win a match in the coveted Browning Cup, the national real tennis professional handicapped singles championship, when she defeated Andrew Krubbs, of Moreton Morrell, in straight sets yesterday.

Happell, 30, one of only two women professionals in Britain, looked sharp and determined, volleying crisply and hitting confidently from the winning opening. She led throughout against the up-and-coming Krubbs and her 6-3, 6-3 win is another milestone in the rapidly expanding women's game. "Everything worked really well for me today," she said. "I was consistent and didn't miss any easy kills. I just felt very confident and I was also cutting the ball well which made it die in the corners — very satisfying."

Having worked as a chef in Melbourne, Happell turned professional in 1992, encouraging scores of women to take up the game and playing in matches with Prince Edward, the Holyport Club's most celebrated member.

Earlier this season, she won the British Open women's real tennis doubles championship, her first major international title. The sister of Australia's top amateur, Mike Happell, she is also an outstanding cricketer and good all-round sportsman.

Despite her successes, she is now about to train for a third career. Two weeks ago she resigned from her job as a professional at Holyport and next month returns to Australia to train as a dietitian. In the meantime, she faces a tough on-court challenge this morning when she takes on the powerful Danny Jones, of Seacourt, for a place in the quarter-finals.

Her successor at Holyport, Ivan Ronaldson, the son of the former world champion, Chris Ronaldson, was also a first-round winner, beating the experienced Mark Ryan, of Lord's, 6-4, 6-3.

Curious customs defeat Philippines dream team

The Asian Games is one of the great events of the sporting round. Perhaps the stars of the show so far, which is potently being held in Hiroshima, are the members of the Philippines volleyball team.

Last weekend, the group of 56 men and women arrived at Fukuoka airport. They were all clad in fancy uniforms, brandishing national flags, clapping identification and passports. They all proceeded through immigration, apparently agog for the fun ahead.

All was going swimmingly until a Japanese immigration official wondered if they weren't well, a trifle short for volleyball players. After all, volleyballers do an awful lot of jumping up and down. "They tend to be 175cm [5ft 10in] and upwards," a spokesman from Fukuoka immigration said.

No luggage was searched. Not one member of the party possessed a single item of volleyball equipment. It transpired that this was an elaborate immigration scam, with passes forged in Hong Kong en route to the Games. The fake volleyball players returned voluntarily to Manila, to pursue their dreams of sporting excellence and of greener pastures from the Philippines.

Tea-izing tippie

Further to this column's recent obsession with Power Booster recipes for athletic success comes Asian Games tea. The Japanese green tea served in the Games village comes with the following instruction: "Caution. Powdered green tea served here contains some amount of caffeine. If you have a game today or tomorrow, we advise you not to drink more than one cup."

Granny bashing

The sport of boxing at the Games has been doing its best to encourage the noblest instincts of humanity. "The spectators at ringside still want to see the knockdowns and the blood," Arwar Chowdhury, a leading official in world amateur boxing, said. "But a lot of grandmothers with nothing to do watch it on television. They don't want to see blood. They are not our kind of spectators, but we have to cater for them."

SIMON BARNES
On Saturday

We have to make boxing safer, no knockdowns, no knockouts, no blood." He spoke against recent safety measures: "It has eliminated blood from the ring. It has become like child's play." So man is either an ape or a grandmother: this column is on the side of the grandmothers.

In the soup

One of the great legends of modern times concerns the Chinese super-athletes and their mysterious and, they say, absolutely and completely "test us any time" drug-free method of Power Boosting. The Chinese swimming coach, Chun Yungpen, regrets that he will not be able to supply his swimmers with one of the crucial elements of the Power Boosting method during the Games, the item in question being fresh turtle blood. "Japanese customs do not allow importing of live animals," he said regretfully, "and we cannot afford to buy any turtles here."

Dizzy heights

Marathon running is an unusual prison sport. At Any in Belgium, however, they have managed to get round a prison's traditional lack of 26 miles and 385 yards of open road by running round and round the prison yard. That was 527 circuits, in all. The dizzy winner of the recent running of this event was a man described only as Abdel A. He beat the personal best that he had set when he was young, free and running in the Brussels marathon.

No laughing gas

More on sporting no-goodniks and Power Boosters: Competitors at a recent road race in the United States were given, in the traditional event goody-bag, free copies of a magazine called Running Times. On page 87 it contained an advertisement for Up Your Gas: yes, the notorious pick-me-up used by the British runner, Solomon Wariso, and which caused him to fail a drugs test. Curiously, this fact was not mentioned in the ad. "Sure, it's an unusual name and most people have a good laugh when they hear it. But once they try it, the laughter stops. You know why? Because it works... You'll get a charge out of more than just the name." Solomon certainly did.

Making a splash

It is a sad fact that no woman, however beautiful and however lightly clad, can truly look her best when forced by circumstances to wear a contraceptive on her head. The generally magnificent swimming person, Sharron Davies, has made the great majority of her public appearances wearing a swimming cap. This is a handicap above which Botticelli's Venus would fail to rise. Davies's riposte against this cruel fate is to become involved in what I am assured will be "a hot and sexy calendar" for 1996, featuring la Davies, plus "a host of leading British track and field athletes and swimmers including Karen Pickering, Alex Bennett and Jennifer Stoute." "Yes, the calendar will be sexy," Davies said. "But it will also be very tasteful and artistic." Who would doubt it?

No sense in crying foul over refereeing clamp-down

As the autumn leaves fall, so English managers, players, and observers drop hints that it is time for a commensurate falling-off in the red cards that have mounted in such numbers in the FA Carling Premiership. The strict refereeing, in the eyes of those on the receiving end, is Draconian in England, and England alone.

That is nonsense. For what statistics are worth, there are more red cards being shown in Italy's Serie A, pro rata, than here in England. But in any case, this is not the time to lose nerve, and the message for those in the professional game who think that they can quickly revert to the abuses, the fouls and the stress on physical disruption is that the clamp-down will go on.

"It has got to continue," Ken Riddon, the Football Association director of refereeing, said. "We can understand that there are players concerned because they have already accumulated as many disciplinary points at this early stage as they did in the whole of last season."

"But remember that it was always the case that players were the ones who committed fouls. The referees are the only medium through which the game can be tidied up, and we believe that the stance taken by Fifa, and adopted in the Premier League, has generally improved football, giving attacking players the freedom to go forward without threat from behind."

Absolutely. The fact that sendings-off have quadrupled at this stage of the season compared to last is evidence that the new code of refereeing is working. The red tide has a certain painful monotony to it, but professional football and the present generation of players are having to go through that pain barrier because the authorities are at last trying to reverse the systematic intimidation and thuggery that had been allowed to permeate play for 20 years or more.

To abandon the effort now would be to abandon the elite corps of 22 referees, chosen by the FA, and charged with carrying out the letter of the mandate of Fifa, the world governing body. These referees themselves now insist that the methods imposed on them, and the back-up from the FA, must continue; otherwise they have been made to court unpopularity to no good effect.

ROB HUGHES

The refereeing scapegoat of the week has been Keith Cooper, of Pontypridd. On Monday, he sent off Gary Gillespie and Jimmy Willis in the Leicester City v Coventry City Midlands derby. It was televised by Sky, and Willis was condemned by both club managers, and by the studio experts, Gordon Banks and Stuart Pearce.

Yet examine the video dispassionately. It shows that Cooper was entitled to interpret the tackle from behind by Gillespie on Julian Joachim as reckless; the first touch from Gillespie caught the ball, but unmistakably the boot then whacked into the lower calf of Joachim, and that, under the new rule, can be interpreted only as a foul tackle from behind.

Similarly, the video replays of the aerial challenge by Willis do not justify pillorying Cooper. As Cooper was at pains to say, the cameras misleadingly showed only the collision from behind, and Cooper stresses that he was perfectly placed to see the forearm and elbow go into the face of the opponent. What is required? A ruling that protects players from bodily assault, or a confusion that allows elbowing in the face.

Riddon has seen the video of Cooper's refereeing on Monday and declares himself happy with both decisions. Good for him: the referees, when they are right, need this approval from their employer. Moreover, Cooper, an approachable and honest man, should not have been made to withstand accusations that the second sending-off was triggered by a feeling of guilt after the first.

Not since he had the courage and decency to admit making an error in not sending off Don Hutchison in a West Ham match, should his application to the laws be doubted. The FA is content to allow referees publicly to explain their decisions, but there will be disquiet in the corridors of power if such explanations, such attempts to give a human face to refereeing, meet nothing but scorn.

Statistics prove next to nothing, but when a manager such as Phil Neal, of Coventry, states heatedly that English referees are interpreting the rules differently from those in Italy, this arithmetic might be offered: after five weekends in Italy, 13 red cards have been issued in 45 games. After 87 Premiership games, 21 cards have been shown. The ratio in Italy is a shade higher, and Italy is in its second season of interpreting a foul tackle from behind as a red card offence.

Moreover, Paolo Casarin, the overlord of Italy's referees, and the closest adviser to Fifa, has observed: "A foul is a foul, even in England. For far too long, English referees let players get away with over-physical fouls on the pretext of letting the game flow." In other words, the game here is not leading the refereeing revolution, merely catching up.

The example of football's crackdown is contagious. In the United States, where even the established sports watched in awe the debate on football's clean-up during the World Cup in the summer, the National Basketball Association has just announced a new package of rule changes every bit as Draconian as football's.

The intention, say basketball's rulers, is to increase the scoring and decrease the fouling, brawling and "trash talking". Penalties include automatic fines of $500 (about £300) a time. Tell that to our squealing footballers.

James and Bennett give boost to British prospects

FROM JOHN HOPKINS
GOLF CORRESPONDENT
IN LA BOULE, FRANCE

IF THE mark of a champion is the way in which he copes with vicissitudes, then consider Warren Bennett. The first of Great Britain and Ireland's golfers to start play in the second round of the world amateur team championship for the Eisenhower Trophy, he hit balls into water on the 2nd and 15th holes at Golf National here, near Paris.

That would have been the end of some but Bennett, 22, showed a maturity that will stand him in good stead when he turns professional shortly. On the short second, he hit his next shot to within five feet to salvage a four. On the 16th his six-iron shot ended no more than three feet from the flag. A birdie was a formality.

To conclude a good morning's work, Bennett eagled the 18th, holing a 40-foot pun from the back fringe of the green. His score, including those two dropped shots for being in water, was a 68, four under par, and it was a very important score for his team.

"Make sure you check your card," Michael Bonallack, secretary of the Royal and Ancient, said. "We don't want to have to call you back in."

Bennett's not so secret agenda is to play as well as he can in this event because it is his last as an amateur. "I want to go out with a bang," he said. His first round of 72 was poor by his standards and his rhythm had let him down.

Yesterday, after a good practice session the night before, his rhythm was back to its smooth best. It was particularly discernible when he played from some of the raised tees that are a feature of the L'Albairoux course. He swung so rhythmically that sometimes it looked as though he was having a practice swing, when, in fact, he was hitting a drive.

ter than Bennett, his team mate. The Amateur champion played the back nine in 31, five under par, eagling the 18th as Bennett had hours earlier. James turned for home thinking that seven or eight under was on the cards. It might have been except that he played his last three holes poorly, dropping a shot at the short eighth where he missed the green with a five-iron. A 66 to go with his first-round 69 means he leads the individual competition by three strokes from Greg Chalmers, of Australia.

Stephen Gallacher had another poor day on the greens and his 75 was the score that Great Britain and Ireland did not count. Unfortunately, Gordon Sherry finished limply. The massive Scot was one under par on the 15th tee, two over coming off the 18th green.

He had to wait for ten minutes while Niccolò Bissazza, a playing partner, hit three successive balls into the water on the 15th and ran up a ten. Perhaps disconcerted by this delay, Sherry sent his second shot into the same water and took six. He missed a putt of less than two feet for a par on the 17th.

Great Britain and Ireland's aggregate of 208 for the day, eight under par, gave them a lead of one stroke over the United States, who had led by five strokes overnight, and two over Australia.

Allen Doyle had a 70 and Todd Demsey a 69 for the Americans. It was "Tiger" Woods who let the side down. He could no better than a 75, which, nevertheless, had to be counted as the team's third best score because John Harris, the fourth member, went round in 77.

On another glorious, golden day it was puzzling that the pace of play was so sluggish. Several groups of three took nearly five hours to get round. This is far too slow, surely?

Bennett: back on form

Keegan and Dalglish present two of the best

By PETER BALL

NEWCASTLE United's season so far has been charmed and charming, delighting the nation with their style and their supporters with their successes. Tomorrow, they face their biggest test yet as they entertain Blackburn, who are also winning games, if few admirers, with their direct, hard-running football.

One Blackburn admirer, however, is Kevin Keegan, the Newcastle manager, who yesterday said that he regarded them as the greatest threat to his side's championship hopes. Blackburn's recent form might suggest that Keegan is being generous, with the European exit at the hands of Trelleborgs FF, a defeat by Norwich and a draw at Birmingham in their last three games. Keegan, however, is more cautious.

"I was shocked when they lost to Trelleborgs, but I don't think Keruy was too bothered — he takes it in his stride."

Uefa has overturned the result of a Uefa Cup first leg match won 3-2 by CSKA Sofia against Juventus last month because the Bulgarian team fielded an ineligible player who scored the winning goal.

Keegan said, "People are talking about a crisis, but they are third in the Premiership and in the third round of the Coca-Cola Cup."

"They are the big danger to our title hopes. Manchester United are still there, and I should be the last man to write them off, but they have other priorities. They feel that, if they are going to be really big, they need to pick up the European Cup. If it was a choice between the two, they would take the European Cup rather than the Premiership. They could win both, but I feel that Blackburn are ready to make a serious challenge."

Watching the two sides at the moment, it is hard to believe that the managers were educated at the same Liverpool footballing academy, for while Newcastle are embodying many of the best Anfield principles of passing and movement, Blackburn are a much more basic team these days, getting the ball forward early to Shearer or Sutton. Dalglish, however, may argue that this is simply playing to their strengths, and his Liverpool team of Beardsley and Barnes embodied many of the principles which can be seen at St James' Park these days.

The match tomorrow will offer an interesting contrast in styles. The game might also provide a test of Newcastle's depth of squad. They have four players injured, Beardsley, Cole, Sellars and Fox. Beardsley, who has a thigh injury, is the most doubtful and, if he is absent, it will remove the potentially fascinating comparison between the two front pairs — Beardsley and Cole, Shearer and Sutton. For all their goals, Shearer admits that he and Sutton can still improve.

A test of Manchester United's priorities, and the depth of their squad, will come at Hillsborough this afternoon. United have had the better of a lot of high scoring games there over the years, but with Kanchelskis and Cantona both on international duty and Giggs injured, they may struggle this afternoon.

Keith Gillespie, the Northern Ireland international, will make his Premiership debut against Sheffield Wednesday in place of Kanchelskis, but otherwise United's line-up is in the balance. McClair, who may regard this as his lucky ground, such is his scoring record there, is likely to play, and Keane may make one of his last appearances before his hernia operation.

Wednesday recall David Hirst in an attempt to solve their goalscoring problems after three games on the bench. "David's been frustrated with his form and that's why I left him out," Trevor Francis, the Wednesday manager, said. "But he's an important player and to have him back and scoring goals would be an important boost."

Roy Evans, the Liverpool manager, must decide whether to leave players out of a winning run when he picks the side to play Aston Villa. Barnes, Rush and Scales are all fit after missing the 4-1 romp at Turf Moor. Barnes's return would be tough on an in-form Jamie Redknapp.

Ardlie, left, whose Tottenham team has lost four successive home matches, and Shilton, involved in public squabbles with his chairman

Knives are out as journey's end approaches

Russell Kempson reports on the managers whose jobs are threatened as the hunting season kicks off in earnest

With the FA Carling Premiership and Endpoints Insurance League programmes less than two months old, the boardroom knives are being sharpened with increasing ferocity. Ten managers have already been dismissed, left by mutual consent, resigned, been shunted sideways or pushed upstairs. Now, the hunting season starts in earnest.

The book has long been closed on Mike Walker, of Everton, whose Merseyside misfits have failed to win in ten league and cup matches. The book has long been closed on Peter Johnson, the chairman, have just about sealed his fate. Defeat against Southampton, at The Dell this afternoon, may prove a reverse too far.

For all Johnson's nice words, he has not earned his millions by tolerating second, or 22nd, best. That Duncan Ferguson and Ian Durrant have been signed on loan from Rangers, with Walker's involvement in the deal apparently peripheral, suggests Johnson is not averse to taking the law into his own hands.

Everton's swift return to the south coast, against a Southampton side that has won five of its last six matches, does not bode well. Ferguson is doubtful with a foot injury and Durrant is likely to remain on the substitutes' bench, with Walker reasonably content with how his midfield performed at Fratton Park.

Sixty-five miles up the A34, the exceedingly public trials of Peter Shilton will continue at Oxford United, where Plymouth Argyle stop off on their latest Endeavour second-division mission. Dan McCauley, the Argyle chairman, has been remarkably frank in the media all week regarding allegations of Shilton's financial misfortune. He also claimed the former England goalkeeper worked only eight hours a week.

On Thursday, at a lengthy board meeting at Home Park, the pair squared up again. Shilton eventually emerged, demanding an apology from his accuser, but McCauley declined. Oxford has witnessed its fair share of high-level squabbling in the past, when Robert Maxwell ruled the Manor Ground roost, but Argyle should remember today that league points are more important than political points. Plymouth are nineteenth in the table, Oxford second.

Take a route along the M40, M42 and M6 and Keith Burkinshaw can be found in similar distress at West Bromwich Albion, where he was due to have discussions of a meaningful nature with Tony Hale, the new club chairman, last night. Albion, next from bottom in the first division, play Sunderland at The Hawthorns today.

Back down in north London, Tottenham Hotspur take on Queens Park Rangers at White Hart Lane, where Osvaldo Ardiles will be praying Tottenham avoid a fifth successive home defeat. He, too, has been given verbal support by his chairman, Alan Sugar, but another loss on home territory would not be the most appropriate response. All around, the daggers are being honed to perfection.

England face tough test

By ALYSON RUDD

THE England women's football team faces Iceland in Reykjavik today in the first leg of their European championship quarter-final match. It promises to be a stern test on a cold afternoon under floodlights in the national stadium. Iceland are a physically strong, imposing side with a well-organised defence.

"They are a tough team, very positive, and very determined," Edward Copeland, the manager of the England team, said.

Copeland watched Iceland defeat Holland a fortnight ago, and sees the key to the match today as being how England handle Iceland's sweeper system.

"We've got to try to beat the sweeper system. We have got one or two things up our sleeves for that, and we know who their best players are," Copeland said.

Iceland's 1-0 victory in Holland took them to the top of their qualification group. Until that game, two weeks ago, Copeland did not know whom England would be facing, even though England qualified six months ago. He had to arrange contingency travel plans to be ready for either Iceland or Holland.

The latter would have presented a very different contest. Although the Dutch were, not surprisingly, the more technically gifted, they tended to pass once too often when a shot might have been more profitable. "Their finishing was very poor. It was atrocious, in fact," Copeland said.

England's finishing, while not that bad, had been a cause of concern for Copeland, although he believes they solved most of their scoring problems during their 6-0 victory over Belgium in March.

Meanwhile, Copeland will be without Gail Borman today. He rates her as the most improved player during his year in charge.

Unfortunately, she has been sidelined for six months with a cruciate ligament injury. She played in all England's qualifying matches, and with Samantha Britton, of Arsenal, and Louise Waller, of Millwall Lionesses, also ruled out, there could be one or two new caps awarded today.

The England manager will not reveal anything, however. He may not, like Terry Venables, be under an intense media spotlight, but Copeland guards his starting line-ups just as closely.

Little movement in money market

By KEVIN MCCARRA

THROUGHOUT Scotland, money is being hoarded to develop stadiums or merely to appease bankers. The Old Firm may be capable of making an occasional dramatic signing, but the everyday business of barter and purchase is almost extinct. Clubs stick by, and are stuck with, the men already on their books.

In Edinburgh, for example, neither Heart of Midlothian nor Hibernian have a single new player this season. When it comes to acquiring a fresh look such clubs can do little more than apply a few rolls of wallpaper and a lick of paint.

Accordingly, it becomes ever harder to hold onto the supporters' attention and their disposable income.

Fortunately, football itself can draft its own intriguing plot lines which have nothing to do with managers' intentions. Long-term injuries to seasoned first team players such as Graham Mitchell and Keith Wright have, for instance, ensured prominence for youngsters in the squad which merge Rangers at Easter Road this afternoon.

Graeme Love, a left back, and Kevin Harper, the 18-year-old striker, have been impressive this season. Harper has particularly sparked comment. At 5ft 6in, he appears at an immediate disadvantage, but, like other small players, possesses a compressed vitality.

His exuberance brought many chances against an uneasy Celtic defence a fortnight ago, even if he squandered as Hibs eventually lost 2-1. He had, however, scored on the opening day of the season when Dundee United were defeated 5-0. His talent is not readily kept at bay.

Alex Miller, the manager of Hibs, has tried to expand his squad but he has been unable to identify the right man at the right price. When everyone is fit Hibs can prove an awkward team and they tend to be at their best before the wear and tear of a season takes its toll.

The pattern is evident in their success in winning the 1991 Skol Cup and reaching the final of the competition in 1993.

Only Rangers have so far scored more than Hibs, for whom Michael O'Neill has been in outstanding form.

The Ibrox side also has a juvenile air, injuries and the inclination of Walter Smith, the manager, to reshape his squad explain the presence of teenagers such as Craig Moore and Charlie Miller in the midfield for last Saturday's win over Dundee United.

Both retain their places in the pool even though Ally McCauley is now fit and Gordon Durie returns from suspension. Alexei Mikhailichenko should be absent despite the fact that Rangers are trying to persuade the Ukrainian FA to permit the midfielder player a day's grace before compelling him to join the international squad for a match next week.

Rangers' future lies with players such as the Australian, Moore. His maturity is not really surprising in a youngster willing to cross continents to sign for Rangers in 1993, when he was just 17.

HOW TO FIND THE MONEY ON LOTTERY STREET

By Nigel Hawkes

Every time Britain has previously organised a national lottery it has ended in tears. Three hundred years ago, lotteries were suppressed as common nuisances by which children, servants and other unwary persons had been ruined. They popped up again, of course: no such miraculous way of raising cash can be suppressed for ever. Fraud, counterfeiting and the rising tide of moralism got them banned again in 1826.

This time, it will all be quite different. A consortium of companies of irreproachable respectability has been given the job of running the lottery. Tickets go on sale on Monday, November 14, and even now the machines that will spill out the lucky numbers are being checked for bias by the British Standards Institution.

Sophisticated encryption systems have been devised and a high-speed communications network installed. Nothing has been left to chance, except the result of the draw itself, which offers us all the implausible odds of 13,983,816 to one against winning the £2 million jackpot.

Camelot, the group that won the contract to run the lottery, is confident that the British public will be happy to take its chance. Certainly, the American state lotteries have generated huge amounts of money: the Massachusetts version sells more than $250 (£175) of tickets a year for every man, woman and child in the state. In the seven-year licence period, Camelot expects to pull in a total of £32 billion, with annual sales peaking in year five or six at about £5.5 billion a year.

The lottery will work like this. Every player will spend £1 to choose six numbers between one and 49, which will be printed on a ticket. Then, once a week on a live television broadcast, the winning numbers will be picked by a random number generator, a machine looking something like a spin-drier which will eject six numbered balls. The first draw will be on Saturday, November 19.

If your ticket contains the six numbers drawn, in any order, you will win a jackpot expected to be worth £2 million or more, or a share of that sum if other people have picked the same numbers. Five correct numbers will win about £1,500; four, about £55; and three, exactly £10. The higher prizes depend on how many tickets have been sold, because the lottery is a game in which the size of the winnings (fourth prizes excluded) depends on the amounts wagered by the punters.

There is a simple formula for working out the odds against choosing the right six numbers out of 49. It is $n!$ divided by $r!(n-r)!$, where n is 49 and r is six. The exclamation mark (mathematicians call it a "shriek") means factorial — that is, $6!$ is $6 \times 5 \times 4 \times 3 \times 2 \times 1$. Not all lottery games are 6/49, as the National Lottery will be: the California lottery is 6/53, and New York 6/54. This may not seem much of an alteration, but it certainly shifts the odds in an unattractive direction. The odds against a jackpot

REBECCA HORN: Prepare to be startled at the Tate, where leading German artist Rebecca Horn is staging a spectacular mini-retrospective. The stately Duveen Gallery is both galvanised and undetermined by a series of controlled sculptural explosions. Knives pierce paint-brushes, while a suitcase opens and shuts as it moves up and down a pole. At her most aggressive, Horn confronts us with pistols that suddenly send out the sound of gunshot. She also menaces us with a suspended, upside-down grand piano which unexpectedly crashes into eruptive motion. But over at the Serpentine, a quieter Horn is presented. The aluminium spikes in The Peacock Machine fan out into the room and then dip gently, without completely losing the old sense of menace. Tate Gallery (071-887 8000) and Serpentine Gallery (071-402 6075) until Jan 8.

THE ROMANTIC SPIRIT IN GERMAN ART: The Hayward Gallery's survey has an ambitious, epic sweep. Starting with the resurgence of Romanticism in early 19th-century painting, the show dares to claim that the same fundamental spirit runs through German art for the next two centuries. The founding father of the movement in painting, Caspar David Friedrich, can be seen at his most adventurous, transforming landscape art. And his awe in front of nature gives way to more eruptive emotions with the advent of Expressionism. The show culminates in the apocalyptic visions of the shaman-like Joseph Beuys. Hayward Gallery, South Bank, London SE1 (071-928 3144) until January 8.

● Last week, we inadvertently announced that Richard Cork's public tour of his Barbican Art Gallery exhibition, "A Bitter Truth: Avant Garde Art and the Great War", would take place at 2.30pm on December 15. It will in fact be held on October 15.

PINK FLOYD: The Pink Floyd levitation finally arrives this week on home soil having hauled its way across North America and Europe on a stadium trek which began in March. Already the highest grossing tour in the world this year, the show will this month play before almost a quarter of a million people over 14 nights at Earls Court. There audiences will witness a colossal display of audio and visual firepower incorporating animated and filmed sequences projected on to a huge circular backdrop, banks of lasers, giant inflatables, massive eruptions of dry ice and the largest twirling disco light-ball in creation. The two halves of the event divide roughly between material from the group's current album The Division Bell (which has topped the chart in 15 countries), and a greatest hits package including "Another Brick In The Wall (Part 2)" and "Money". A show which is more confirmation than revelation, but still stands as a display of unrivalled dimensions and panoramic splendour. Earls Court, Warwick, London SW5 0RT (071-373 8141). Wed 12-Sun 16, Wed 19-Sun 23, Wed 26-Sat 29, 7.30pm.

SPIN DOCTORS: They've just lost their original guitarist, Eric Skenman, due to "artistic and creative differences", and the band's sophomore album, Turn It Upside Down, has failed to repeat the spectacular success of their Pocket Full of Kryptonite debut. But with replacement guitarist Anthony Krizan already on board, Spin Doctors are still a force to be reckoned with and nowhere more so than in the live arena. A great night out.

VI REDD: There are few enough female instrumentalists in the upper echelons of jazz. Vi Redd represents an even rarer commodity as both a vocalist and a hard-blowing saxophonist in the post-Parker mould. A former sideman (for should that be "sideperson"?), with Earl Hines, Dizzy Gillespie and Count Basie, she is an emphatic, no-nonsense performer who has helped to prove that there really is musical life in Los Angeles. She makes a rare appearance here, working with a trio led by the versatile pianist Colin Purbrook, a musician whose thoughtful touch is always in demand with visiting soloists. Pizza Express, Dean St, London W1 (071-439 8722), tonight, Thur to Sat.

STANLEY JORDAN: "Touch Sensitive" was the aptly-titled album that introduced the Chicago-born guitar virtuoso Stanley Jordan to an international audience 12 years ago, not long after he graduated from Princeton. His highly unorthodox solo recitals — in which he creates dense contrapuntal lines by tapping the guitar strings with both hands — caused a good deal of jaw-dropping among his fellow guitarists. Putting the legend to rest, he is back with a new album, Touch Sensitive, which is more confirmation than use was a bigger problem; some of his performances had a tendency to peter out into superficial trickery. Jordan later shifted towards a more dynamic jazz-rock. It remains to be seen whether he will be the long-term choice to replace the late Joe Pass, for so many years the guitarist of choice at Ronnie Scott's.

MESSIAHS ALLOVER: Yes, this is the day that Britain responds to the sound of Handel's Messiah. More than 150 performances of the great oratorio will happen simultaneously around the country tonight, involving 120,000 people. There is bound to be one near you. But Radio 2 is also broadcasting live the performance by The Sixteen choir conducted by Harry Christophers at St John's, Smith Square. The whole mad scheme is to benefit the hospice movement: Handel, who did his fair share of "charity gigs", would approve. St John's, Smith Square, London SW1 (071-222 1061), tonight, Sat, 7.30pm.

PURCELL CELEBRATED: England's greatest composer? Henry Purcell has to be a contender, along with Britten, Elgar and Byrd. Unlike the other three, however, Purcell's music is not widely known. Next year's tercentenary of his death should remedy that. At the Wigmore Hall they are starting the Purcell feast early: this Thursday the young conductor Robert King and his King's Consort give a mixed programme of choral and orchestral pieces. Wigmore Hall, Wigmore St, London W1 (071-935 2141), Thurs, 7.30pm.

THE Labour Party might have risen from its knees this week, but evidence was mounting in Blackpool that it is now attempting to capture the Tory mantle of the Church of England at prayer. It is being said again that socialism owes more to Methodism than to Marxism, and the growing success of Christian socialism can be judged by the jocular suggestion from one MP that he wants to found an opposition movement of atheists against religion.

I joined delegates and party activists for Thursday's conference communion, the first ever to be celebrated by a woman priest, the Rev Tricia Impey, ordained in May. Front-bench members of the Christian Socialist Movement include Tony Blair, Gordon Brown, Jack Straw and Chris Smith. MPs who have led morning worship at the conference include Hilary Armstrong and Paul Boateng. Although none turned up for our service, I felt certain they were all praying hard — the conference was running late and was taking its narrow vote on Clause Four and common ownership.

The movement has recently acquired its first office and full-time staff member, David Cairns, who until May was working as a Roman Catholic priest in Clapham, south-west London. Mr Cairns led our prayers: "We pray for all families, for those under threat from poverty and hardship, for married couples, and single people bringing up children."

"Let us keep silence for a moment and reflect on those things that separate us from one another and from God," said Mrs Impey as we knelt to confess our sins. Alison Ryan, general secretary of the Christian Socialist Movement, read from the prophet Amos: "I hate and despise your feasts and I take no delight in your solemn assemblies." We heard the beatitudes from the Sermon on the Mount in Matthew's Gospel: "Blessed are the poor in spirit, the kingdom of heaven is theirs." This brought to mind the belief of Keir Hardie, the first Labour MP, that the beatitudes set out an ideal model for society. Recent research has shown that two of the most important influences on Labour MPs are the Bible and R.H. Tawney, this century's most famous apologist for Christian socialism. Phil Kavanagh, also of the movement, was still reading the Gospel: "Blessed are those who hunger and thirst to see right prevail. They shall be satisfied."

Mrs Impey preached from the early church father, Irenaeus, who said: "Keep a good disposition, lest being hardened you lose the imprints of His fingers." It is not religion of itself that can make reality of a vision for the future, she said. "In fact, often religion can get in the way. It is our relationship with God and the way we grow in that relationship that gives substance to our faith." She suggested an alternative translation for one of the beatitudes: "Blessed are those who know their need of God." At that point, the news filtered through to my pew: the conference had voted by a tiny margin in favour of common ownership.

VICAR: Canon Richard Impey, ARCHITECTURE: Brick church faced with stone, built 1878. The famous, slender Blackpool Tower competes on the skyline with the shorter but more solid parish church tower to capture the imagination on the approach to the town. ★★

SERMON: Mrs Impey spoke on what it meant to be a social human being: "But we always need to remember our other identity as the people of God." ★★

MUSIC: One hymn, accompanied by Brighton delegate Claudia Clarke, plucked from the congregation and, luckily, an accomplished pianist. ★★

LITURGY: Rite A from the 1980 Alternative Service Book seemed somewhat appropriate in this context. ★★

AFTER-SERVICE CARE: Coffee, tea, fruitcake and sandwiches plus political chat. ★★

SPIRITUAL HIGH: Left me feeling neither up nor down, but a little less right-eous. ★★

IT'S PLASTIC: Once, plastics were hailed with glamour and romance. Now they are cheaper and more accessible and we have started worrying about what they are doing to the environment. High time, the Design Museum considers, for us to draw back, construct a historical perspective, and weigh merits and defects. The show contains horrors and kitsch, but also beauties of a new kind. Never again will it be possible to look at a Formica-topped table and sneer. The Design Museum, Shad Thames, London SE1 (071-403 6933), starts this Friday, Mon to Fri 10.30am-5.30pm, Sat-Sun 10.30am-6.30pm, until April 23. Museum admission £4.50, concessions £2.50.

● See today's Magazine, page 82, for Stephen Bayley on the exhibition, plus two tickets for the price of one.

NEW YORK, NEW YORK: It sounds like an unlikely subject for this normally staid museum. But while the reference to On The Town is not misplaced, it covers many aspects of New York besides the Bernstein razzmatazz. The prints between the 1880s and 1990 are selected from a collection of over 4,000. All are in black and white, and inevitably the magic of the skyscraper conquers all. Fitzwilliam Museum, Trumpington Street, Cambridge (0223 332900), Tue-Sat 10am-5pm, Sun 2.15-5pm, until December 18.

OPERA

RHEINGOLD/WALKÜRE: Fasten your seat-belts for the first instalments of the Royal Opera's new Ring cycle: whether or not a bumpy ride is in store will depend on how one of the most pliant combinations imaginable works out. One the one hand Bernard Haitink, whose conducting of Wagner is one of the glories of the age, and a top-flight international cast, who should among them guarantee that the operas are musically as distinguished as it is possible to get nowadays. On the other, the amateur producer Richard Jones and his designer Nigel Lowery, about whom the only predictable thing is that they are totally unpredictable. If the chemistry works, the outcome will be sensational, and whatever else happens — there is already dark talk of un-Wagnerian stretch limos — there will be no complaint of anyone being bored, and anything is preferable to the hours of greyness that have characterised Ring productions over the last decade. Clunk-click. Royal Opera House, Bow St, London WC2 (071-240 1066/1911). Rheingold Thurs 13, 7.30pm; Walküre Fri 14, 5.30pm. ●

IL TROVATORE: When an old warhorse like this is properly rehearsed and imaginatively cast, the results are thrilling, and such is the case with Opera North's new production of Verdi's gore-sodden masterpiece. Paul Daniel conducts with rare insight, and the principals — Edmund Barham, Sally Burgess, Ettore Kim and Katerina Kuravchenko — deliver far more than just lung-power. Inga Levani's production may be a touch old-fashioned, but you can't have everything. Grand Theatre, New Briggate, Leeds (0532 459351/440971), Wed 12, 7.15pm. ●

DANCE

BIRMINGHAM ROYAL BALLET: Two premieres begin the new season. The Three-Cornered Hat is based on a Spanish comedy about a dirty old man who tries to pull rank but is put down by a miller and his wife. Massine's choreography, Falla's music and Picasso's designs all bring bright colouring to one of this century's dance masterpieces. In Enigma Variations, Ashton's choreography neatly hides the lack of any dramatic structure in Elgar's music by concentrating on the portraits, comic or romantic, of the composer's friends. With these comes Galantes, David Bintley's suite of dances to music by the young Mozart.

Birmingham Hippodrome, Hurst Street, Birmingham (021-622 7486). Tues 11 and Fri 21 at 7.30pm, Wed 12 and Sat 22 at 2.30pm and 7.30pm, in repertoire with Romeo and Juliet. Then touring to Edinburgh, Bradford, Plymouth and Bristol.

GRUPO CORPO: This company from Brazil is virtually an unknown quantity: reviewers in New York and Toronto praised the dancers but seemed more cautious about the choreography, all by one of the founders, Rodrigo Pedreira, to Brazilian music and Mozart's early "Orphanage Mass". Festival Theatre, Palace Avenue, Paignton, (0803 558641). Today, 7.30pm; Sadlers Wells, Rosebery Avenue, London EC1 (071-278 8916), Tues-Fri, 7.30pm, Sat 15, 2.30pm and 7.30pm.

NEVILLE'S ISLAND: Tim Firth's darkish comedy is a sort of Lord of the Flies: a portrait of middle managers descending into barbarism after a company-organised adventure and survival course maroons them on a deserted island. The pluses include sharp-tongued dialogue and Tony Stacey as a highly articulate Mr. Nasty. Apollo, Shaftesbury Avenue, W1 (071-494 5070). Evenings, Mon-Fri, 8pm, Sat, 8.30pm; matinees Wed, 2.30pm, Sat, 5pm.

ION: Nicholas Wright's fine revival proves there is not just life and energy in Euripides' tale of lonely Ion's reconciliation with his mother, but depths of feeling sufficient, on opening night, to reddens the eyes of the cognoscenti. Pit. Barbican Centre, Silk Street, EC2 (071-638 8891). Monday and Tuesday, 7.15pm. Continues in repertoire.

FORREST GUMP (12): "Hello, I'm Forrest, Forrest Gump." Not much of a conversation opener, but Robert Zemeckis's film, ragingly popular this summer in America, uses such flat remarks as a springboard for a half-comic, half-sappy tour through four decades of American history. Technically, there is much to wonder at: some brilliant computer tinkering puts Tom Hanks's drawing, simpleton hero on the frontline of history with assorted Presidents, Governor Wallace and John Lennon. THE LION KING (U): Disney's newest animated feature is not for tiny tots, who might be disturbed by the violence and guilt surrounding Simba, the African lion cub forced into exile by his wicked uncle after his father's death. Politically correct adults may also be unhappy about the film's colour coding. But the cartoon does have one major virtue: a strong narrative that keeps on course even when the writers seem to be mixing Hamlet with Bambi. in a 6/53 lottery are 25 million to one, and in a 6/54 lottery more than 25 million to one. (New York, in fact, sells two tickets for a dollar, which brings the odds back down to 12.5 million to one.)

Second, third and fourth prizes offer slightly less vertiginous odds: 12,500 to one against getting five of the numbers right in the National Lottery; 920 to one against getting four right; and 54 to one against getting three right. What this means is that for £1 you have a one in 54 chance of winning £10; if bookies offered such a prospect, they would not expect to be trampled in the rush. It is the vanishingly small chance of hitting the jackpot that keeps the lottery punters coming.

The trick with organising lotteries is to ensure that the jackpot isn't won every week. "Rollovers", in which the jackpot is carried over to the following week, greatly add to the fervour with which people play the game. The National Lottery is limited by law to three successive rollovers, when three draws have failed to find a jackpot winner, the prize money will be redistributed to the lower prizes in the next draw.

At least the National Lottery will give its winners an enormous cheque, tax-free, unlike many American lotteries which actually offer only an annuity. Winners of the $1 million prize in most American lotteries may find that what they are in fact getting is about $35,000 a year: nice but not overwhelming. The American lotteries do this because it is much cheaper to buy an annuity that will ultimately add up to a million than to hand over the cash.

There is only one sure way to win a lottery, and that is to buy enough tickets to include every possible combination. This may sound impossible, but it has been done not once but three times by an Australian, Peter Mandel.

For his biggest coup, Mr Mandel chose to play the Virginia state lottery, a 6/44 game which meant that $7 million would be needed to cover every combination. He gathered a team, waited for a week in which rollovers had pushed the jackpot to $27 million, and pounced.

Just buying that many tickets would have been physically impossible, so the team printed their own, and swapped them in supermarkets for the real tickets—legal at the time. They needed 20 computers, 12 laser printers and 16 people working full time to pull it off.

In the end, the whole plan nearly failed, when part of the team stopped work, leaving Mr Mandel with only 90 per cent of the possible combinations. But one of them came up, and nobody else had it, so he won the $27 million. This kind of malarkey will not be worthwhile in Britain. To be sure of winning a 6/49 game, a syndicate would have to spend almost £14 million, and the limit on rollovers means that the jackpot will never be that large.

But how can we manage to get our share? Well, the lucky will win and the unlucky will lose, but most people can expect the odd £10 fourth prize. For those prepared to spend some time at it, there are ways to increase the chances.

So what can be done to improve on the odds?

Sam Weren, a physicist who works in industry in the north of England—he is reluctant to be more specific lest his work makes a mockery—has put his mind to the problem and produced a book, The National Lottery Book—winning strategies. For a start, he says, no random number generator is ever perfectly random. It will tend to pick some numbers more often than others: a bias that may be imperceptibly small but after a sufficient number of draws, sophisticated analysis using computer programs developed for astrophysics may be able to detect it.

"It'll be very, very small, but if there's a chance of winning millions, it's well worth looking for it," he says. "I'll definitely do it."

Mr Weren also offers some advice about which numbers to pick. Many people, he says, pick numbers which are simply too low.

They have the same mathematical chance of winning, but if they do there is a much greater chance that other people will have picked the same combination, splitting the prizes.

Why people pick lower numbers is not entirely clear, though the tendency to choose their own birthdates is one reason. Since there are only 12 months of the year and 31 days in the month, numbers below 31 tend to be chosen.

Mr Weren also suggests that the numbers chosen, when added together, should total between 135 and 185. If winning totals from lotteries are plotted, they follow a bell-shaped curve whose peak for a 6/49 game is at totals in this range. But it strikes me that this tells us something about mathematics, and nothing about lotteries: sets of six numbers chosen from 49 inevitably show such a distribution, if they are randomly chosen.

A more sophisticated technique, invented by the mathematician Robert Serot, is called "wheeling": this is used when you make multiple entries. Choosing your six numbers for each entry from a pool of, say, ten or 12. The object is to ensure that every possible winning combination of these

Though unsophisticated in its way of selecting winning numbers, "La Lotte" game in Naples attracts hordes of punters

Winners and losers

● The size of the cash prizes in national and state lotteries is dwarfed by the magnitude of the emotions that accompany the winning or losing of them. Whereas finding oneself a few million pounds better off is utter joy, the anger and frustration of a near-win can be positively dangerous.

● Jim Desantis, a factory foreman from California played the state lottery for 65 weeks with the same set of six numbers, winning a total of £3. On the 66th week, when he had neglected to enter, his numbers came up. He missed out on £5 million. "Suddenly," Mr Desantis said, "I wanted to die."

● Kirk Godson of Portland, Oregon, believed that he had lost a winning lottery ticket worth £2 million. Such was his despair, he decided to lose his life as well. After his death, the state lottery announced that there were no winning tickets for that draw.

● Doris Barnett from Los Angeles thought she had netted the £2-million top prize in the state lottery—all she needed was the sixth ball on the wheel of fortune to match her sixth number. The wheel spun, the ball bounced—and fell into the right number. She was ecstatic. Three seconds later, the ball fell out. The lottery's rules claimed that it had to stay there for five seconds. Mrs Barnett handed it well. "I'll be back," she told the organisers. She was. She sued the company for the prize money, and was awarded an extra £266,000 in damages for "emotional trauma".

● When seaman Jim Cohoon of Toronto won £250,000 in the lottery, he was seized by a fit of generosity and started to dish out $1,000 bills to passers-by. He also spent £50,000 on his shipmates. Within 11 weeks he had spent every cent, and because he had given up his job, ended up on the dole.

● Frieda Procidia, an Illinois housewife, dropped her lottery ticket in a bakery. A policeman friend, Phillip Sylvester, picked it up and refused to surrender it. Under duress, Procidia allowed Sylvester to keep the ticket, so long as he shared any winnings. The ticket won the £6 million jackpot. Sylvester kept the lot.

GUY WALTERS

numbers is included. The real bonus of this technique, Mr Weren argues, is in collecting second and third prizes.

Let's suppose that instead of picking six numbers, you choose 12. Producing every possible way in which those 12 could be arranged in groups of six would cost £924 to play—with odds of winning the jackpot still only one in 15,000. The wheeling technique consists of using charts of numbers arranged in rows and columns (called matrices) to come up with a pared-down version, costing much less, that maximises the number of lower prizes you may win. Computer programs are available to carry out the same task.

In the case of selecting combinations of six from a pool of 12, Mr Weren says that a strategy costing £18 ensures you could arrive at a combination of numbers that would win you at least a second prize—assuming the six winning numbers were in your original 12. A big assumption.

Convinced? Not at all. But we can be sure that as soon as the lottery gets under way people will devote themselves to identifying the "hot numbers"—those that seem to be having a run—and the cold ones, which never seem to come out of the machine. Despite offering all the skill of bingo without the community spirit, lotteries do attract frenzied support. Perhaps it's not so surprising. In America, millionaires are being created at the rate of two and a half a day through lottery jackpots: California alone created 173 of them in 1990.

Look at it that way and the odds don't seem quite so dismayingly long.

THE TIMES LOTTERY PRIZE DRAW

21,000 National Lottery tickets to be won

STARTING today and continuing over the next four weeks, The Times is offering readers the chance to win thousands of National Lottery tickets for the first draw on Saturday, November 19.

There are expected to be about 250,000 lottery winners in the first draw, with cash prizes ranging from £10 to an estimated £2,000,000.

Each entry into The Times National Lottery has a one in 54 chance of winning a prize. So, with 21,000 lottery tickets bought on your behalf by The Times on Monday, November 14, the first day of sale, it is extremely likely that we will have a fair number of lottery winners among our readers. Lottery tickets cost £1 and are valid for one week only. Ticket buyers can either select their own six numbers from 1 to 49 or the numbers can be randomly selected for them when they buy a ticket.

Our agents will select the numbers randomly and will send their number confirmation ticket receipts to our data input team, who will then enter our lottery numbers on to our database so that we can allocate numbers to ticket winners.

All ticket winners will be notified by post, after the closing date, Tuesday, November 8, 1994.

FIRST PRIZE 10,000 £1 tickets

SECOND PRIZE 2,000 £1 tickets

THIRD PRIZE 1,000 £1 tickets

Ten fourth prizes of 100 £1 tickets

100 fifth prizes of 20 £1 tickets

500 runners-up prizes of 10 £1 tickets

HOW TO ENTER

TO enter, simply collect ten lottery tokens from The Times.

The first token is printed at the bottom of this page and further tokens will appear each day, Monday to Saturday, in The Times for the next four weeks, giving you a total of 24 tokens—and enabling you to make two entries in the draw for tickets.

When you have collected ten tokens, send them with an official entry form, printed below (the entry form will be

The Times Lottery Prize Draw, PO Box 2746, Colchester, Essex CO1 1QU.

Your entry will then be entered in The Times lottery prize draw.

The ticket winners will be selected randomly from entries received after the closing date, Tuesday, November 8, 1994, and notified by post.

INCREASE YOUR CHANCES

READERS can enter up to four times to increase their chance of winning lottery tickets by also collecting tokens from The Sunday Times.

Over the next four weeks, The Sunday Times will publish a total of 16 tokens. Collect all 16 tokens from The Sunday Times and all 24 tokens from The Times and you can enter our draw four times.

Each entry must be on a separate entry form and must be accompanied by ten tokens from either The Times or The Sunday Times.

TWO BONUS ENTRIES

In addition, if you collect and save all 40 tokens from The Times and The Sunday Times you will be given two FREE entries into the prize draw. When you have collected the 40 tokens, complete our bonus entry form, which will be printed on Saturday, November 5 and send it with your tokens to the address above.

Wickedest thing on the street

I am to the world of fashion roughly what Anna Pasternak is to the Nobel Prize for literature. My wardrobe ceased to change, stylistically speaking, after 1977. In fact, my daily apparel is so far out of fashion that (by some mysterious cyclical process) it is sometimes perceived to be bookish again.

"During the emergence of something called 'grunge', for instance, I discovered that my shapeless sweaters and scuffy shoes had somehow turned me into The Wickedest Thing On The Street. Young ladies would stop me in the office, appraise me approvingly from napper to feet, and gurgie 'Hey! I love it!'."

To which there is no answer. Or perhaps there is, but not when you are on deadline. Unfortunately, grunge's 15 minutes of fame soon passed, and so did my brief reign as Fashion King of Wapping.

Now, thanks to a brilliant new book, my life is transformed. I am fashion-conscious, or at least plausible on the subject. The book is Ted Polhemus's Streetwise: From Sidewalk to Catwalk. It isn't published until next week, tied to a

V&A exhibition of post-war fashion, but it is clearly going to be an indispensable bible for bluffers.

Already I can sit in Covent Garden bars, survey the scene, and murmur "retro neo-New Romantic, 1992" in a world-weary, supercilious sort of way. I can discourse with authority on the annual British Tattoo Festival in Dunstable — which, according to Polhemus, perfectly illustrates "the tribal imperative" within us all.

Put me in front of a techno, a cyberpunk or a psychobilly and I will identify each without hesitation. I have memorised chunks of Polhemus's text for use at parties. "Ah yes," I shall say, when the subject of those intriguingly déshabillés dancers called "riot grrrrs" comes up, "by mixing such apparently opposing styles, 'riot grrrrs' are constructing a dialogue on feminine sexuality which draws as heavily on the unisex practice of punks as on feminist theory."

Gosh, that will dazzle them in the dining-rooms of Hendon.

It must be admitted that Polhemus does instill a feeling of inadequacy in his, shall we say, more mature readers. "Accidentally! By 1988 this was the word on everyone's lips," he tells us. By 1988, you say? Oh dear, I only ran it across my lips yesterday, and very strange it felt. Still, as yet I am a novice at this fashion game. Go with the flow, that's my new motto! I can already feel the tribal imperative rising within me. And anyway, it's about time that I bought a new sweater. Is C&A open late tonight?

High drama in the West End! No, not up there on the stage. I refer to the outbreak of verbal fisticuffs among the critics. Much more exciting, don't you think?

The scribes have worked themselves into a tizzy over whether there are too many "gay plays" around. First The Independent and Daily Telegraph carried articles pointing to the "pink" trend. Then Nicholas De Jongh, the London Evening Standard's ebullient critic, attacked these "preposterous" colleagues for upholding a "suburban net curtain" morality.

Unfortunately for Nick, his own newspaper immediately stabbed him in the back. The very next day it allowed his predecessor, the still vigorous Milton Shulman, to vent his spleen under the hilariously apocalyptic headline "Stop The Plague Of Pink Plays".

So are there too many gay plays? In narrow business terms the answer must be no. The West End is a viciously commercial place: even the subsidised sector has to watch its box-office carefully. If gay plays were not pulling audiences, they would be off. Perhaps there is no area in which the "pink pound" is so influential as in the theatreland. What's more, such playwrights as Tony Kushner, Brad Fraser and Jonathan Harvey produce dramas that are powerful and good, irrespective of their subjects.

Still, there is a danger. The facts may not support the thesis that serious drama is obsessed with gay lives and Aids-related deaths — but this misconception is nevertheless widely believed. There is a real possibility now that contemporary drama will be perceived as a no-go area for straight people.

That would indeed be a tragedy. After 50 years of state subsidy of the arts, ostensibly designed to increase accessibility, the serious theatre seems perilously close to becoming a ghetto.

And now, from our "wacky world of the avant-garde" department, may I introduce you to Sewage Art? You will, I trust, be hurrying down to a sewage works in Winchester next Saturday, for the opening of an exhibition titled "From H2O: You won't? Well, you will be missing something."

With what the organisers describe as a "mythological potency of water and waste in mind", three artists have begun a "residency" at Southern Water's disused Garnier Road pumping station. They will be drawing inspiration, they say, "from Victorian notions of sanitation and moral uprightness, and from present-day preoccupations with cleanliness". Oh dear, I sense a social metaphor coming on.

The three are nothing if not imaginative (aided, of course, by public subsidy from the ever-gullible Southern Arts Board). For instance, a sewage pumping engine is to be "transformed by layers of white gloss and a muslin ceiling into a sterile shrine", and given the name Virgin.

The artists describe themselves as "abstract painters who have become disoriented with the stereotype of the artist working in isolation". How going to work in a disused sewage station overcomes the problem of isolation is something I leave you to ponder over your breakfast. Incidentally, I've got an ominous patch of rising damp in my kitchen. Do you think, if I draped the whole thing in white muslin and called it Ancestral Shadow, I could get an Arts Council grant for it?

Canvassing for Britain

PARIS EXHIBITIONS: The French have learnt that we produce art too, says John Russell Taylor

In the long and chequered story of relations between France and Britain, there is one thing the British can certainly congratulate themselves on, even if it is not very flattering: we know a lot more about French art than the French know about ours. Indeed, the very idea of D'Outre-Manche, the major new show this autumn at the Louvre, is curious, to French and British alike: it is a survey of British art, from Elizabeth to Victoria, from French public collections.

In fact, there is more than might be supposed, but the show is a real ragbag. The largest amount, and probably most of the best, is in the Louvre itself, and even there, the catalogue frankly admits, it has been more a matter of accident and random benefactions than a consistent buying policy. The first "important" British work acquired seems to have been Rembrandt's Francis I et la Duchesse d'Etampes in 1849, a subject from French history painted by an honorary Frenchman. Not until the 1960s did an important "late" Turner, a Fuseli, a Wright of Derby and a Zoffany enter the collection.

Elsewhere in France, things seem to have been equally haphazard. Bordeaux, perhaps because of its old alliance with England, seems to come out best, and we are told that the Museum of the French Revolution at Vizille has just this year made a promising start by acquiring two British works relevant to its theme, Maria Cosway's The Death of Miss Graham and Sir William Hamilton's Marie Antoinette.

nette Leid to the Scaffold, neither of which is in the show. As it is, the show seems unduly bulked out with prints after important British paintings and a roomful of Remney sketchbook material — interesting but disproportionate. There are some respectable works by Reynolds — including one once famous, The Infant Samuel at Prayer, which was acquired by a French collector as far back as 1778 — as well as others by Gainsborough, Lawrence and Stubbs. But very rapidly one gets the feeling of splashing around in the shallows.

There is no doubt that the Musée Carnavalet does better with its reflections on le style anglais, Les Anglais à Paris au 19e Siècle, by choosing a lightweight subject which has the resources to study in depth. It is largely, though not entirely, a case of "as others see us". Clearly the British were a constant source of wonder and amusement to French caricaturists from the first moments, in the aftermath of the Napoleonic wars, that French women allegedly took a prurient interest in what was (or wasn't) under a Highland soldier's kilt. The English milord is seen strutting round, with his awful, dowdy womenfolk, or chatting up glamorous Parisiennes of dubious morals. But in this area the French got as good as they gave: the excesses of the French capital offered English caricaturists ample scope. And there were even British painters, such as Thomas Shotter Boys and William Wynd, who painted Paris with true admiration and affection.

The two French painters celebrated in grand style this autumn, Gustave Caillebotte, who died in 1894, and Nicolas Poussin, who was born in 1594, could hardly be more different.

Caillebotte, until very recently, has seemed like the also-ran, among prominent Impressionists. He was always there, ready with the organising ability and personal diplomacy necessary to mount the successive Impressionist exhibitions. He was friend to all and patron to more than a few. As an artist he was largely self-taught.

However, Caillebotte was clearly a very serious painter indeed, who went his own way and followed his own obsessions with a fine disregard for what anyone else was doing. Stylistically he is a sort of bridge between Manet and Degas on the one hand, who had little truck with plein-air painting, and Monet, Renoir and Pissarro on the other, who made it a shibboleth. He is as good as any at catching a certain fall of the light, a certain sparkle on the water. But he is interested in more permanent, monumental effects than that. He is obsessed with perspective, an obsession which goes right from the amazing early interiors, through the superb townscapes such as Rue de Paris, temps de pluie, to the late pictures of his own gardens at Petit Gennevilliers, across the Seine from Argenteuil. He died at the age of 45 — a fact that makes this body of work even more impressive.

Poussin lived until his seventies, had a triumphant career loaded with honours, and has always been regarded as one of the peaks of French art. The chance offered by the 400th anniversary of his birth for a giant survey is taken with gusto at the Grand Palais (Caillebotte); this is no doubt the largest show since that at the Louvre in 1960.

It is a grand academic exhibition that progresses steadily along the middle of the highway. The most controversial it gets is in catalogue essays outlining the history of such questions as whether Poussin was more Italian than French. Naturally since this is a French show, the answer seems to be that he is now felt to belong very decisively to French art.

It is not only a French show, however. For good historical reasons Britain is so well supplied with major Poussins that it can hardly be excluded, and sure enough, the Royal Academy has fully collaborated, and the show will be seen at the RA in January.

GREAT BRITISH HOPES

Rising stars in the arts firmament

MARK BRICKMAN

Profession: Theatre director

Age: 34

Distinguishing features: Looks ten years his own junior. Gently spoken with gusts of laughter.

Productions: From Hamlet performed in a turn-of-the-century theatre on the edge of the Brazilian jungle with the Actors Touring Company (of which Brickman became artistic director when he was 25); to A View from the Bridge at the Sheffield Crucible (where he was artistic director at the age of 30); to Eugene O'Neill touring the Highlands and Islands, including performances in Scout huts, for Scottish Opera.

His latest: Great Expectations for the Oxford Stage Company, his own expressionistic adaptation of Dickens.

A family history of showmanship? There was a great great uncle who ran two theatres, one now the Camden Palace. His brother is a magician as was his grandfather. Brickman has not employed magic yet but, he says, "as children we were deeply involved in it. There were loads of books flying around."

Playing around: He collected Victorian toy theatres as a youngster. "Relatives used to boo and hiss my ghastly Christmas performances." He acted at school in Wimbledon and directed at university — "small grotesque pieces to scandalise the Cambridge establishment". At that stage, he got frustrated with the messy changeability of theatre and desired more artistic control. Right on cue, he won a Fulbright scholarship to the New York Film School.

Returning to Britain: He worked as a runner, a researcher, "then I thought, 'Oh my God, this'll take 20 years. And moreover, I can just go into a room with stage actors and have something to show for it.'"

Theatre, take two: Hey presto, he won the Regional Theatre Trainee Director Award. This deposited him in Farnham ("which drove me bonkers"), whence he sallied out to the Warehouse, Croydon, then to the ATC. "That was wonderful: ensemble work and travelling with a fascinating repertoire." The Crucible was less heavenly. "I don't think I'm temperamentally suited to running an institution. I like the flexibility of freelancing and small companies."

He got out after a little more than a year. "I kicked away a career ladder and got on with enjoying directing."

On his work: "I've been interested in epic, poetic, imagistic theatre. I'd like to do more contemporary work: tap into what's in the air. If I've got any sense of where I'm going, it's probably into directing-writing, ideally both in film and theatre."

On himself: "Oh God. I sort of bumble along."

■ Seats at all prices

■ BABIES: Jonathan Harvey's clever if chaotic comedy, set at a schoolgirl's birthday party, where sexual longings get out of hand. Royal Court, Sloane Square, SW1 (071 730 1745). Mon-Sat, 7.30pm; mat, 3.30pm. Until Oct 22.

■ BEAUTIFUL THING: West End transfer for Jonathan Harvey's award-winning and touching play about teenage love, gay and straight, on a London council estate. Duke of York's, St Martin's Lane, WC2 (071 836 5123). Mon-Thurs, 8pm; Fri and Sat, 8pm and 6.30pm.

■ THE CHILDREN'S HOUR: Clare Higgins and Hamish Waterhouse, two schoolteachers accused of being lovers by a traitor. Lifford Hall, 1954. National (Lyttelton), South Bank, SE1 (071 926 2252). Today, 2.15 and 7.30pm.

■ DANCING ON BLACKWATER: Chicago-born Bonnie Greer's play for Black Theatre Co-operative explores the attempts by two sisters to escape the damage done by their mother's suicide during their childhood. Watlington, Longwell Road, East Croydon (081 880 4080). Tue-Sat, 8pm. Sun, 5pm. Until Oct 16. Tour follows.

■ THE HOSTAGE: Spirited revival of Brendan Behan's subversive romp, back around the edges, written at a time (1958) when 'the Troubles' could be staged as patriotic picaresque. Barbican, Barbican Centre, EC2 (071 636 8891). Today, 3pm and 7.15pm.

■ JOKING APART: Alan Ayckbourn's black comedy about a 'golden couple' whose glitzy lives have gone wrong. Comedy, Panton St, SW1 (071 369 1731). Mon-Thurs, 8pm; Fri and Sat, 8pm and 6.30pm. Until Oct 29.

■ THE MORTAL ASH: Richard Cawston's choral drama of a Yorkshire family, victims of a huge campaign. Percipio and warm; well worth seeing. Brixton, Brixton Centre, SW9 (071 874 0281). Mon-Sat, 7.30pm; Sun, 2.30pm. Until Oct 29.

■ MOBY DICK: David Calder plays the one-legged Captain in Gerry Mulligan's production for the RSC. Visually fine but ultimately unconvincing. PBL, Brompton, EC2 (071 636 8891). Today, 3pm and 7.15pm.

■ NEVILLE'S ISLAND: Tony Slatery heads a strong cast playing a quartet of businessmen disastrously lost in the fog during a team-building exercise in Lifford Hall, 1954. National (Lyttelton), South Bank, SE1 (071 926 2252). Today, 2.15 and 7.30pm.

■ THE OFFICIAL TRIBUTE TO THE BLUES BROTHERS: 'Juke' and 'Blood' give two hours of soul, blues and rhythm 'n' blues. Lights, nose, good comedy. Panton St, SW1 (071 369 1731). Mon-Thurs, 8pm; Fri and Sat, 8pm and 6.30pm. Until Oct 29.

■ ONCE ON THIS ISLAND: Slightly respected production of the hit Broadway musical, transferred from Birmingham Rep. Showbiz and Caribbean folk-tale proves to be a successful marriage. Lifford Hall, 1954. National (Lyttelton), South Bank, SE1 (071 926 2252). Today, 2.15 and 7.30pm.

■ ONLY THE LONELY: Lany Branson in Bill Kenwright's musical on the life and songs of Rex O'Riordan. Piccadilly, Denham St, W1 (071 369 1731). Mon-Thurs, 8pm; Fri and Sat, 8pm and 6.30pm. Until Oct 29.

■ THE PICTURE OF DORIAN GRAY: Complex staging of Wilde's famous tale. Striking performances by Maria Aiken, Benedict Barnes, Bette Bourne and Tom Post-Smith. Lyric, King St, Hammersmith, W6 (01 731 2111). Mon-Sat, 7.30pm; mat, Sat, 2.30pm. Until Oct 15.

■ THE PLAYBOY OF THE WESTERN: A comedy of a cowboy's performance by Alistair O'Sullivan in a strong, tough and well produced by Lynne Parker of Synge's comic masterpiece. Almeida, Almeida Street, N1 (071 359 4404). Mon-Sat, 8pm; mat, Sat, 4pm.

■ THE SEAGULL: Just Dorch rules the roost, heading a splendid cast in Panto Opera's new version. National (Owl), South Bank, SE1 (071 926 2252). Today, 2pm and 7.15pm; Mon, 7.15pm.

■ THE SISTERS ROSENBERG: Limited run here for the Greenwich Theatre production of Wendy Wasserstein's 100 copy years 'n' laughter drama. With Margaret Lyons, Janet Suzman and Linda Bullington. Old Vic, Waterloo Rd, SE1 (071 926 7616). Mon-Fri, 7.45pm; Sat, 8pm; mat, Wed, 3.30pm and Sat, 4pm.

■ TWO WEEKS WITH THE QUEEN: Play for family audiences adapted from Morris Gleitzman's excellent story of a 12-year-old boy who learns about death and the value of family love. National (Comet), South Bank, SE1 (071 926 2252). Today, 2.30 and 7.30pm.

■ WAX: Panto Opera's production of the seriously weird tale of Madame Tussaud. Shows Morris takes the role in Lifford Hall, 1954. National (Comet), South Bank, SE1 (071 926 2252). Today, 2.30 and 7.30pm.

RECORDINGS: Sax in the Renaissance; an eccentric bash at Beethoven; glorious gospel voices; Suede set the year's rock benchmark

Stephen Pettit

ENSEMBLE/GARBAREK
Official
ECM New Series ECM 1525
(445 360-2)

THIS recording has already soared up various charts since its issue last month, and I think it rather wonderful. The Hilliard Ensemble and the Norwegian jazz saxophonist Jan Garbarek have taken a sequence of medieval and Renaissance pieces, polyphonic and otherwise, and submitted them to Garbarek's spontaneous improvisations.

What emerges is, in one sense, a disc of new pieces based on old ones. But in another sense the old pieces remain intact. These are simply fresh interpretations, and Garbarek's contributions are all reaction, not so much embellishment or commentary as eloquent embodiment in sound (and what movingly expressive sounds he makes) of what this music does to him.

And that is what moves me, for Garbarek's meditations grow not from any self-serving exhibitionism, but from the very heart and soul of the originals.

His sensual, meditative playing, often taking its cue from the voice most resembling the saxophone in timbre and pitch, the counterpoint of David James, doubles the intensity of a piece such as Cristobal de Morales' "Peregrini Domine", plucked from his Requiem setting.

In fact, that piece is heard here three times, twice at each end of the disc — with input from Garbarek and once without, the implication being that in the central performance we can, as it were, silently improvise for ourselves.

Other named composers whose polyphony is represented include Pierre de la Rue, Dufay and, from nearly a millennium ago, Perotinus, while elsewhere plainsongs become enriched with new resonances, sometimes with the singers' own added contributions in the form of nasal drones.

The acoustics of the Monastery of St Gerold in Austria are aptly resonant.

BEETHOVEN
Piano Concerto in D
BACH
Concerto in D for keyboard and strings, BWV1054
Mustonen/Deutsche
Kammerphilharmonie/
Saraste
Decca 443 118-2

THE 27-year-old Finnish pianist Olli Mustonen has something of a reputation for quirkiness, and this is nothing if not a quirky disc, beginning with the works featured. Beethoven himself made the arrangement of his Violin Concerto for piano and orchestra, and although it is never likely to supplant the original, it is worth the occasional outing — if only for its cadenzas. The Bach concerto was also transcribed from violin to keyboard by the composer, who transposed it down a tone, from E major to D, in the process.

The cadenzas for the Beethoven are interesting because, whereas the composer wrote none for the original Violin Concerto, he did write those for the transcription. That for the first movement introduces a march with obligato timpani, proving once again that however bizarre the solutions proposed for such cadenzas, it is difficult to beat Beethoven at his own game. When Mustonen makes the third-movement cadenza sound like something out of the celebrated Tchaikovsky concerto, however, even the forward-looking Beethoven might have been taken aback.

Mustonen's eccentric performing style has more serious consequences. At first one can relish the crystalline tone and the rhythmic verve, even while questioning whether such mannered phrasing makes truly musical sense. But by the finale patience is exhausted. Not only is the phrasing of the rondo theme perversely lopsided, but the tone is now merely hard, so that the accents grate on the ear. Fortunately or unfortunately, Jukka-Pekka Saraste and his orchestra, whose phrasing is characterfully but musically sculpted throughout, do not go in for this sort of nonsense, with the result that the soloist is further sidelined.

The other work on the disc fares even worse. With his fortissimo lunges within phrases and off-centre phrasing, Mustonen's account might appeal to those who enjoy the swirly reworkings of Jacques Loussier. But it has little to do with Bach.

STRAUSS

Salome
Norman/Witt/Leech/
Morris/Raffiner/Dresden
Staatskapelle/Ozawa
Philips 432 153-2 (2 CDs)
PHILIPS has been slow to issue its Salome, recorded in Dresden in 1990. One reason may be the strong competition for Richard Strauss's neurosis-filled opera. DG has Studer with Sinopoli (actually made after this Philips version) and EMI fields Behrens with Karajan, drawn from the production which played in Vienna and Salzburg that will not be forgotten by anyone who saw it. Both of these go straight into the  category.

On Philips, the best is on the second of the two CDs. It begins with a silken, sensuous account of the "Dance of the Seven Veils" from Ozawa and the Dresden Staatskapelle. Nothing is overstressed, strictly ballroom. Dresden, after all, was the city chosen by Strauss for the first performance, and the tradition shows in the quality of the playing. Once the dance is over, Philips's star, Jessye Norman, shows herself the great Strauss singer we know her to be. Herod (Walter Raffiner) is reduced to a gibbering wreck as Salome demands first the head and then the lips of John the Baptist.

This is Norman in full sail: imperious in her demands, sumptuous in voice as her soprano easily dominates Strauss's huge orchestra. Like all great Salomes, Norman sounds totally uninhibited.

But the path to the closing scene is somewhat rocky. The almost baritone quality in Norman's voice hardly allows her to suggest the teenager, bored with court life and curious about the white flesh of the prophet enclosed in Herod's dystem. Studer was marvellous at evoking the capricious adolescent, as indeed was Caballé on record before. Nor does Ozawa convey the fin de siècle sickness which fills Herod's court in the way Sinopoli did with the Deutsche Oper, Berlin. Everyone is ill with something; Narraboth with love, Herod with lust, Herodias with jealousy. All is there in the orchestra.

Philips's supporting cast is variable. James Morris's Jokanaan is consistently powerful, whether reverberating in his cistern or preparing the way of the Lord outside it, but Bryn Terfel (DG) showed much more of the young zealot. Richard Leech's Narraboth is outstanding — a clean-cut, besotted moon-calf.

Kerstin Witt exudes a mixture of evil and madness as Herodias. But Walter Raffiner's Herod, thin in tone, sounds more like an escapee from Wozzeck than the Tetrarch of Judaea.

Take Sinopoli if you want Strauss with all his nerve ends showing or Karajan if you prefer him shimmering and decadent.

SCHUMANN

Liederkreis Op 39
BRAHMS
Vier ernste Gesänge
Fassbender/Leonskaja
Teldec 9031-74872-2
THE combination of repertoire speaks volumes; the names speak for themselves. I would take as original and independent a musical thinker as Brigitte Fassbender to place Schumann's Liederkreis next to Brahms's Four Serious Songs. And when the pianist is Elisabeth Leonskaja, the result is strong stuff.

Fassbender: original

Those who can scarcely wait for Fassbender's latest release will revel in her passionate engagement with the Romantic poetry of Eichendorff as set by Schumann: the full forest horror of "Waldesgespräch", the voice almost yelling its terror, and the first song's real weight of solitude.

Those who feel that Fassbender can sometimes kill the thing she loves could argue that some songs are oppressed by an emotional weight greater than they can bear. The fragility of happiness, the sense of the soul hovering over the body, are lost to the all-encompassing darkness of "Intermezzo" and "Mondnacht".

Passing judgment on the Schumann must, then, remain a matter of taste. I challenge anyone, though, to fail to be impressed by her Vier ernste Gesänge. The core of live passion and anger of these songs rescues them from any ponderousness, and Fassbender's own commitment is constantly inflamed by the playing of Leonskaja.

Wade In The Water, Vols 1-4
Smithsonian Folkways
SF-40072/5 (distributed by Koch Int)
DO NOT be deterred by the unfamiliar names of the performers. Bernice Johnson Reagon's magisterial survey of gospel singing — originally compiled for an American National Public Radio series — forms the most imposing vocal anthology of the year.

For the past 20 years she has been the leader of Sweet Honey In The Rock, the all-female cappella group which takes its inspiration from both sacred and secular traditions. Wade In The Water draws on that experience as well as her work as a curator at the Smithsonian in Washington.

Volume One returns to the 19th-century origins of gospel in the stately "concert spirituals" of the Fisk Jubilee Singers — as interpreted by modern campus choirs and a community group. These tracks, with their austere, Europeanised harmonies and classical cadences, are a revelation. The pioneering composers of gospel — the prolific Thomas Dorsey chief among them, naturally — are honoured on the stirring third disc, on which Sweet Honey In The Rock make a fleeting appearance. This, and the first volume are the essential purchases for anyone interested in acquiring a grounding in the genre.

Volumes Two and Four, meanwhile, shift the focus to congregational and community styles past and present, from venerable ring shouts to the very fringes of R&B.

SUEDE

NUDE NUDE 3
SUEDE's self-titled debut album, released last year, scaled previously unimagined heights of critical acclaim, which makes the task of reviewing Dog Man Star rather awkward. What superlatives are left to describe a follow-up album next to which the debut "masterpiece" pales almost to insignificance?

It is not just the songs that make this album such a triumph, although they are brilliant enough. From the sleazy, art-school rock'n'roll of "This Hollywood Life" to the spine-tingling chorus of "The Power", from the macabre, shrieking pile-up of noise at the end of "Daddy's Speeding" to the gorgeous lilt of "The Wild Ones"; from the murky, two-minute drone of "Introducing The Band" to the stately, ten-minute epic "The Asphalt World", it is an album simply teeming with drama, invention and surprises.

But what eventually moulds the collection into something more than the sum of even these extraordinary parts is the way in which songwriters Brett Anderson and the recently departed Bernard Butler distil the sad, seedy zeitgeist of 1990s Britain and turn it into something thrillingly, romantically out of the ordinary.

There is everything from lean guitar riffs to the 40-piece Sinfonia of London orchestra soaring away behind Anderson's heroically overwrought performance on the album's closing track, "Still Life".

If at times it all drifts wildly over the top, that is a small price to pay for such an embarrassment of riches. This is the English rock album against which all others in 1994 will surely come to be judged.

That Woman's Got Me Drinking

ZTT ZANGS6

BOOTED out of the Pogues three years ago for unreliable behaviour, Shane MacGowan comes staggering back into the limelight with a performance of typically reckless, wheezing endeavour which knocks spots off anything on the last Pogues album.

MacGowan: reckless

An exuberantly chaotic, soft-shoe shuffle in the classic punk-Celtic vein which he popularised with the Pogues, "That Woman's Got Me Drinking" confirms MacGowan's extraordinary talent for something, although Lord knows it is not singing. Pictured on the cover swathed in a blanket, he looks as if he has returned from the dead, which is virtually what he has done.

Genuine ROMAN OIL LAMP

APPROX. 1600 YEARS OLD!

These fascinating relics of the ancient past were all unearthed from the ruins of Roman sites in Palestine - The Holy Land. They date from the 4th to 5th Centuries AD, around 1,600 years old in a remarkably good state of preservation considering their great age. A great conversation piece - Just handling one of these ancient artifacts helps to bring history alive. No two are exactly the same. Shapes and sizes vary but mostly they are around 4 to 5 inches in length. Comes with a free display stand.

Ancient Roman, Greek, Persian and Egyptian Antiquities always available.

All the fun of the fair where crafts come to life

As the famous Chelsea Crafts Fair gets under way, we look at the pick of the crop of this year's top designers who will be exhibiting

The 16th Chelsea Crafts Fair opens next week boasting a record number of craftsmen and women from around Britain showing and selling their wares. A selection committee of Amanda Game, director of the Scottish Gallery in Edinburgh, Ilse Crawford, editor of Elle Decoration, potter Peter Starkey, and furniture designer and maker Julianne Dolphin-Wilding picked the 225 exhibitors from more than 900 applicants, hence the high standard and wide diversity of work on show.

The fair runs from October 11 to 23 and is divided into two weeks and two sets of exhibitors. The organisers have been careful to select the same cross-section of crafts to be shown each week. According to Morris Lathan, head of sales development for the Crafts Council, the fair is an exciting event for both visitor and exhibitor. "For the visitor, it is not only a chance to buy something unique, but to meet the person who made it," he says. "For a lot of the year, the most contact exhibitors get with the outside world is via Radio 4's Woman's Hour," Mr Lathan says. "It is great for them to talk to and get feedback from visitors."

Sarah Feather, a new exhibitor, graduated last year from Staffordshire University with a first in design. She specialises in "surface pattern design", and now works from an attic at her parent's home in Ilkley. Ms Feather discovered a way to preserve slices of fruit and vegetables while studying for her final project, a method which she has since patented and introduced throughout her work.

Using mostly star fruit, pears, apples, kiwi fruit, mangetout, tomatoes and cucumber, Ms Feather encases thin slices of fruit or vegetable between two layers of fabric, usually silk chiffon. She then uses the fabric to make lampshades, pictures, drapes, cushions and necklaces, and says the finished effect is "of fruit floating in fabric".

Her preserving technique remains secret, but all of Ms Feather's early work using fruit, made 18 months ago, is in perfect condition and has kept its colour. Prices for a 15-inch cushion start from £60, from £75 for a lampshade and from £300 for a 7ft drape.

Another first-time exhibitor is Bex Marriot, a book-binder who works from a converted brewery in Lewes, East Sussex. She follows the traditional binding method of sewing and folding sections together and makes the pages and covers from Indian or Nepalese handmade paper and crude or fine leather. She then decorates her books by splashing on acrylic paints or inks, working in collage or stamping on words in relief.

These are books which "people always want to stroke and smell, they are both functional as well as moveable sculptures," Ms Marriot says. Particularly covetable are the sketch books (from £35), photo albums (from £65), and wedding albums (from £75), which are made to commission and can be decorated with names, initials and pressed dried lavender and rose petals.

Japanese knit designer Hikaru Noguchi, exhibiting in the first week, boils, dyes and machine-knits yarns to make coverings for stools and chairs and has just launched a new collection of woollen foot-stool covers (from £195).

Annie Black, another London textile designer, makes hand-dyed and hand-woven scarves, shawls and throws. Born and raised in San Francisco, Ms Black was given her first loom at the age of ten. She is mostly self-taught and finds inspiration in the work of artists such as Mark Rothko, Braque and Sean Scully. This is her fourth year at the fair. Her work is based around tartan but in colours that she describes as "garish, jarring and lurid — I enjoy exploding taste." That said, her work is stocked by artbers of interior design taste, The Designers' Guild on London's Kings Road. Ms Black charges from £38 for a wool scarf to £550 for a silk throw.

Above: Sarah Feather specialises in "fruity" textiles — she encases thin slices of fruit or vegetable between two layers of fabric, usually silk chiffon; from £60 for 15-inch cushions; £65 for an apple-core choker; £300 for a 7ft silk chiffon drape encased with star fruit, kiwis, apples and pears.

Devonshire ceramacist David Cleverly says he "can't stand the drab and the dismal", and his works confirm his words. Mr Cleverly combines elements of the old Staffordshire pottery style "to pay homage to the original without making a slavish copy". This is his second visit to the fair and his works range from £80 to more than £150.

Luggage maker Wylske Lazenby is leaving her converted water mill in northwest Herefordshire to sell her leather goods during the second week of the fair. Trained as a saddler, Ms Lazenby uses vegetable-tanned leathers to make cases, boxes and bags from cuff-link boxes (£60) to large trunks (£750). Some of her quirkier pieces include children's leather suitcases containing a toy car (£200), and antique hunting flasks with silver cups and leather case (from £450).

Often it is the exhibitor's medium which makes their work so fascinating. Tony Viney makes bowls, plates, book-ends and dominoes from Purbeck stone, a lower Jurassic stone which is around 160 million years old and filled with tiny fossil shells.

He describes his manufacturing methods as "fairly fraught", often involving up to 30 different stages of cutting, chiselling, grinding and sawing to achieve stone plates that are "as thin and delicate as china". He charges from £30 for a small, simple plate to £450 for a more intricate piece made to commission.

Hampshire furniture designers Gaze Burvill, having noted that garden furniture was mostly upright, angular and often uncomfortable, developed a design for benches and chairs with curved back rails, placed at varying angles, to support the lower back.

GARDENING

A magical array of greens, browns, reds and oranges among the rare trees and shrubs on display along the riverbank at Winkworth Arboretum in Surrey

Happy autumn fields of colour

Positioning is all important, says
George Plumptre
The Times
Gardener

Brilliant autumn colour is often a description to treat with caution. To my mind some of the most enjoyable autumn colours can be found among the native trees of hedgerows such as the common Acer campestre, or field maple, whose pale yellow, autumn foliage is refreshingly understated when compared to the electric hues of some of its garden relatives such as the cultivars of Acer japonicum, the Japanese maple.

Thanks to the clarity of light on sunny days around the autumn equinox, at the end of September, the exquisite colours of deciduous woodland are highlighted as the leaves turn. The subtle contrasts of hedgerow colours are hard to imitate but a look round a few of the best autumn foliage gardens shows the importance of positioning and grouping of the plant material. Westonbirt Arboretum in Gloucestershire and Sheffield Park in Sussex are good examples. Westonbirt is renowned for its spectacular groups of acers. Their massed foliage, in shades of red, orange and yellow, stands out against a background of majestic evergreen conifers, or provides the edging to a broad, open glade.

At Sheffield Park the grouping of individual trees on the edge of water adds enormously to the effect of their colour. In mixed groups, including evergreens amid an array of autumn colour, the Nyssa sylvatica make bold columns of red, orange and yellow, reflected in the water.

Visitors to Sheffield Park should make time to go to High Beeches, only a few miles away, which has been developed as an autumn garden since its original planting at the beginning of this century. Then, Colonel Giles Loder (of the illustrious gardening dynasty) was influenced by his friend, Arthur Soames of Sheffield Park.

He thinned the mature beech and oak to create vistas and open glades. He planted new ornamental trees either as single specimen trees or in groups to enliven the native trees. Colonel Loder died in 1966 and the house and garden were bought by the Boscawens, who have continued his work. The garden includes a National Council for the Conservation of Plants and Gardens (NCCPG) collection of Stewartias (or Stuartias). This small family of unusual but immensely beautiful trees produce white or cream camellia-like flowers in July and August and then spectacular red or yellow autumn foliage. Another distinctive characteristic is attractive flaking bark, especially on Stewartia pseudo-camellia, which is the most widely grown. All Stewartias like partially shaded woodland and lime-free soil. Once planted they should not be disturbed.

Near Bedale in Yorkshire is Thorp Perrow Arboretum, where Sir Leonard Roper began planting his collection of trees 50 years ago. Thorp Perrow is comparable to Westonbirt in the way in which evergreen conifers provide the background for smaller deciduous trees with distinctive autumn foliage, for instance groups of different acers in front of a variety of green or golden cypresses. The size of the arboretum allows for single varieties of trees to be planted in large numbers, for example, the avenue of red oaks, Quercus rubra. These trees, part of the Thorp Perrow NCCPG national collection of oaks, produce dazzling red foliage at this end of the year.

Trees for autumn colour need to be thoughtfully integrated into a garden, especially a small one. An Acer palmatum planted in splendid isolation on a lawn in anticipation of its glowing red foliage can have the effect of a pedestrian-crossing beacon, if it is not integrated in its setting.

Partly for this reason, I prefer trees whose autumn colour is a shade of yellow. One of the best is Ptelea trifoliata "hop tree" which, like so many autumn foliage trees, originates in eastern America.

GARDEN ANSWERS

STEPHEN ANDERTON replies to readers' letters

Q I have an American persimmon (Diospyros virginiana) grown from seed collected in America. It has been in the open ground for nine years and is 9ft tall. It has not bloomed yet. Can it be expected to? — Peter Draisley, Tiverton, Devon.

A This species of persimmon is less common than the Far Eastern species Diospyros kaki, which is the one commonly sold in markets. It can reach 100ft high in America, and therefore, like most large trees grown from seed, it could well be 10-20 years before flowering begins. It is barely hardy in our climate, and is only likely to thrive outdoors as a wall shrub in favoured areas. It requires the heat of a greenhouse to begin to produce good fruit.

Q Moles are running riot in a shrubbery of rhododendrons, magnolias and camellias, and are now making excursions into the lawn alongside. I have been pouring Roachdine into the runs to control them, but have been advised that diesel oil is equally effective. Will this harm the shrubs? — A Stanbrook, Cranleigh, Sussex.

A Diesel will certainly harm your shrubs, and fuel oils should not be poured anywhere near plants. You could safely try the effect of diesel by putting a little on to pieces of rag or cotton wool, and putting them into the runs. Such a small amount would be harmless to your shrubs. The most effective method of control, in practised hands, is still trapping. Tunnel traps do not stick up above the ground like the traditional cross-over traps, and are therefore safer where children and pets are around. They can be purchased from LBS Polythene, Cottontree, Colne, Lancashire.

Q We have several clumps of bamboo which are fairly well established. Last year they were covered by flood water for several days. This has killed many of the old stems, although a few weak stems are now struggling through. Should we cut off the old, dead canes or leave them as protection for the emerging shoots? — Dr A.A. Newton, Bude, Cornwall.

A Cut out all the dead stems at once, to let in the light to the new shoots. You should find that they then grow more strongly. (You will also gain a stock of garden canes.) It may be that the new shoots, if they are long and have been hemmed in by dead canes, are too weak to support themselves, and you may need — for this year at least — to cut the dead canes down to a height which still gives the new shoots some support. If the new canes are not self-supporting by next year, cut them off to the ground too, and make a completely fresh start. Next spring give them all a heavy dressing of ordinary, rich old manure.

Bamboos which have been knocked back so hard to take a year or two to get going again, but if there are signs of life they will make it in the end.

Dream for sale, house included

Lynn Greenwood reports on decorated show houses, for sale off-the-peg, and talks to a couple who bought one

It is the day of baby Harry's christening. A two-tier cake trimmed with blue ribbons is in place on the dining-room table, a bottle of Australian sparkling wine in the cooler waiting to be uncorked. Christening cards are propped up around the house and presents are waiting to be opened.

Upstairs the pretty outfit bought specially for the occasion for Harry's little sister — white cotton embroidered dress with frilly petticoats, straw hat and tiny circular bag — lies ready on her bed.

Among the collection of family photographs placed tastefully around the four-bedroom detached house, the close-up portrait of mother and baby, just a few days old, has pride of place.

But this family does not exist. It was created by one of the interior designers employed by house builder Ideal Homes, to invest its show homes with a lifestyle. At the Wharfedale Mead development at Menston, near Ilkley, West Yorkshire, Ideal Homes has two show homes, open daily.

"We are selling an expensive commodity to people who cannot always see what they are getting," says Gill Grover, sales manager of Ideal Homes (Northern). "Everyone knows what a mess building sites can be and the show homes are our shop window." Ideal Homes spends between £1,500 and £8,000 on decorating and dressing its show houses, depending on their size and whether the furniture is bought or leased. The furniture is then either used on another site, or returned.

Today the trend is for "dressing out", adding personal accessories to the expected carpets, curtains and furnishings, to give viewers the sense that they are taking a privileged peep into someone else's life.

Sian Woodfine, design director of Marren, a design company employed by house builders including Ideal Homes, chose the christening theme "for its warmth factor".

"The house suggested a young family to me and the christening was a way of introducing young children right through the house," she says.

She believes show homes should be aspirational, but stay beyond what most families can achieve, but not out of reach.

"I have created a wedding day, silver and golden wedding anniversaries, a day in the country with a picnic basket, maps and camera in houses on different sites."

In baby Harry's house, his nursery is perfect: rocking chair for breast feeding, pine cot with soft toys and Babygro, dresser with everything from cotton wool to zinc cream and castor oil.

In his sister's room, her pink ballet dress hangs on the wardrobe, ballet shoes and vanity case on a chair. Copies of Rapunzel and Little Bo BEEP are propped in her bedside book case.

In the spare room, where grandparents may stay after the christening, a tea tray lies on the bed next to more presents and a card marked "Harry".

To minimise the damage done to carpets by the hundreds of visitors to Ideal's show homes, a basket of blue plastic shoe protectors ("they're actually surgeons' caps") is provided.

"We get lots of people looking round who have no intention of Nigel and Ann Smith with their son Marcus, 11, in the show house they bought near Halifax. Another show house, below, near Bradford has the lived-in touch moving house," says Mrs Grover. "Many of them are looking for design ideas and we handle hundreds of requests for details of a particular wallpaper or fabric. We always try to help them with references."

Nigel and Ann Smith did choose to buy a show home, for £112,000 whereas £105,000 is the normal market price for a non-show home. Their home enjoys "the best position" on a new Ideal Homes development near Halifax, West Yorkshire. Mrs Smith, a bank clerk, says: "We were very impressed with the house and the way it was decorated and displayed. I like to see nice things, but I don't have either the time or the artistic eye to always create them."

They moved in last weekend. "It is brilliant to be free from the hassle of decorating and tackling a new garden," she says. "The only thing we are going to change is the bedroom for our son Marcus. At the moment it's decorated for a girl and he pulled a bit of a face when he saw it."

Neither Mrs Smith nor her husband, a preparatory school headmaster, is concerned that thousands of people will have tramped round their home before they move in. "Then it was just an empty show house, but now we're finally here, it is our home," says Mrs Smith.

At Bryant Homes' "Silver Birch" development at Alwoodley, Leeds, in-house designer Kate Watson-Knell chose a travelling theme for the five-bedroomed Ambassador detached house, for sale from £230,000.

A couple of 1940s brown leather suitcases and a trunk stand in the hall, and the study reveals a collector with a passion for sport with its pair of wooden skis, wooden framed tennis rackets and well-worn skating boots.

"We have a type of family in mind for each house and we work to a strict budget," says Ms Watson-Knell, who spends hours scouring antique markets and fairs for accessories with "impact". Evidence in the Leeds show homes includes a box gramophone and collection of 78 rpm records, anti-quarian books and a pair of china King Charles spaniels.

The sink full of tea mugs in dirty washing-up water in the utility room either owed something to thirsty builders or added a final touch of authenticity.

Buyer's France: LA VIENNE

NORTH of the Dordogne, the département of the Vienne, an area of gentle hills and wide rivers in the Poitou Charentes region of France, is often overlooked by British buyers and prices are low.

South of the river Loire, the region enjoys a relatively mild winter climate, with long hot, dry summers. Centred on the university town of Poitiers, it has many picturesque medieval towns and villages, pretty châteaux and romantic churches dotted across the countryside.

The Poitou vineyards are nearby, and the Atlantic-swept beaches of the Charente Maritime, extending south from La Rochelle to Royan, are about two hours' drive away. There are several lakes for windsurfing, sailing and waterskiing, rivers to fish and underground caves to explore.

Small manor houses in good condition, often with sizeable acreages, can be picked up from around £120,000. Expect to pay at least £200,000, however, for a habitable chateau with turrets, moat, stables, outbuildings and parkland.

THERE ARE also a number of more modest dwellings for sale. Stone cottages for renovation start from around £20,000, which buys a shabby, but habitable two-bedroomed house with a small garden.

Old farmhouses untouched by modern conveniences cost from £15,000. The fully restored version will set you back anything from £40,000 to £60,000. A house with swimming pool will be priced from £70,000.

South of Poitiers, close to the borders of the Charente, the Dordogne and the Haute Vienne, a fully restored farmhouse with barn and swimming pool, on five acres of land, is for sale at £72,000 (sterling transaction). The old stone-built house has four bedrooms, two bathrooms, three reception rooms, a fitted kitchen and utility room. The detached two-storey barn could be converted to provide additional accommodation.

The nearest market town is St Mathieu, midway between Limoges and Angoulême. The UK agent to contact is The French Property Shop, Wadhurst Road, Mark Cross, East Sussex TN6 3PB (0892 852449).

Alternatively, for £378,000 (about £45,000) you can buy an attractive stone-built house in the valley of the river Vienne, near the border with the Charente. According to UK agent Barbers (110 Westbourne Park Road, London W2, 071-221 0555), the property is habitable, but needs some updating.

Giles Gordon deplores the scramble for scandal at Frankfurt

William Rees-Mogg thundered in these pages earlier in the week against Bloomsbury for publishing the vilely composed Princess in Love by Anna Pasternak: how her great-uncle, the author of Dr Zhivago, must be spinning in his grave. Even Barbara Cartland complained about the prose, declaring it not her style at all. By the end of the first day of the forty-sixth annual Frankfurt Book Fair, Bloomsbury had sold translation rights in the meretricious volume to France, Holland and Japan. And the American rights to Viking Penguin.

Peter Mayer, the dazzling chief executive of Viking Penguin, is an honourable man of drive, passion, intelligence and vision. He published Salman Rushdie. And now he has acquired from Bloomsbury the US rights in Princess in Love for, it is said, either £200,000 or $200,000. As Lady Bracknell would have spat out with disdain, the price is immaterial.

I am not urging that the British publishing industry should appoint the equivalent of the film censor or the Lord Chamberlain, the gentleman who used to decree which plays we should be allowed to see. I am suggesting that to be a publisher is to have responsibilities less to shareholders (Bloomsbury is a plc) than to society, to readers and to one's integrity.

The world of Frankfurt is divided between those — and they are many — who admire what Bloomsbury has done, taking it to be a crafty piece of publishing which will subsidise more serious, less saleable titles (and anyway the younger royals had it coming to them) and those, like me, who believe publication of the book to be an abomination.

If there is a book of the fair, it is Princess in Love, and that brings no credit to the international publishing community. It is not for me, or for anyone else, to tell Peter Mayer and Viking Penguin what to publish. What is astonishing is that publishers, reared on good books, think it appropriate to expend their resources, human and financial, on such drivel.

Similarly, Pan Macmillan is publishing Mrs Robert Maxwell's story, and other publishers were reputedly queuing to sign up Frederick West's lawyer, Blake Publishing is whispering at the fair that it is to bring out Camillo, The King's Mistress, a biography of Camilla Parker-Bowles.

Finally (enough is enough), journalist Eve Polard and two friends have sold to Headline a novel called Splash about three powerful media women. Perhaps the idea is that a novel by three authors will sell three times as many copies as a novel by one. More probably, none of the authors had the time to write the entire novel.

On the first day of the fair, the British ambassador to Germany was to be found on Reed's stand, being lectured by publisher Richard Charkin. Charkin apparently briefs the ambassador every year.

This week, his message was that the British publishing community would keep coming up with the ideas for interactive and multimedia concepts as they have always done with imaginative books, even if the Americans might make more of them in the long term.

6 The book is in danger of entering the new Dark Ages

A year ago I observed that, in the era of fax machines and instant global communication, the Frankfurt Book Fair is redundant except as a kind of pleasure palace for tens of thousands of the world's publishers. This remains the case. Certainly serious publishers discuss serious books with serious publishers from other countries and translation rights are sold but, without Frankfurt, they would surely still be sold.

If Frankfurt is no longer to do with the art of the book, what is it to do with? It has become, in the words of publisher turned agent David Godwin, the home from home of the concept book, a pragmatic if cynical device which provides publishers with the wherewithal to carry on publishing. Richard Charkin may be serious about trade publishing, but this did not stop him from commissioning Caroline Upcher to write Swan, which poses as a novel by "supermodel" Naomi Campbell. So, too, with Princess in Love.

I feel that, with the advance of multimedia, the book and the publishing of books are in danger of entering a kind of new Dark Ages. If standards can be lowered so easily, why shouldn't they be lowered even further? Yet it is hard to imagine how this could be. Perhaps next year's Frankfurt will reveal.

An evening with Archbishop Tutu

DURING Nelson Mandela's imprisonment, Archbishop Desmond Tutu became the voice of the anti-apartheid movement in South Africa. He will share his experience of life under oppression and the birth of South African democracy at a Times/Dillons Forum, introduced by Terry Waite, on Monday, October 24, at 7.30pm at Westminster Central Hall, Storey Gate, London SW1. Archbishop Tutu will sign copies of The Rainbow People of God afterwards.

For tickets, either complete and return the coupon with your remittance, or contact Dillons on the numbers given on the coupon.

Momentary panic attack

Did a viral outbreak in 1989 threaten the human race? Nigel Hawkes thinks not

THE HOT ZONE
By Richard Preston
Doubleday, £14.99

IN December 1989 a consignment of monkeys sent from the Philippines to a research laboratory close to Washington DC were found to be infected with a rare and deadly virus.

No humans caught the bug, which was fortunate. The Ebola virus in its original home in Zaire is one of the nastiest germs around, killing 50-90 per cent of those who catch it. The monkeys were slaughtered and the lab cleared and disinfected, but a month later there was a fresh outbreak among a new batch of monkeys.

This time, four people were infected, but none suffered serious symptoms. A potentially alarming incident had passed off with no public health consequences: the real victims, alas, were the monkeys. It turned out that the virus almost but not quite leaked out of the American capital from the lab at Reston, Virginia, was of a different strain and far less pathogenic than its African progenitor.

The current flap over plague in India shows that infectious diseases still have the power to spread panic. The arrival of Aids from Africa ten years ago is evidence, too, that the dark continent may indeed prove to be the breeding-ground of new viral infections with worldwide implications.

But the Reston incident, for all of Richard Preston's overexcited prose, was not a national disaster, nor even a local one. It made an interesting footnote in the virology texts, but it is impossible to feel that it began to justify a book written and promoted in such a fevered fashion as this one.

The Hot Zone hops to and fro between Africa and the American laboratories, reporting every incident with a mass of circumstantial detail which must be invented, unless all Preston's informants have total recall. Much of it is neither relevant nor informative, but it is applied with a trowel.

What are the facts? In Africa, the virus has caused deaths, and nobody yet knows exactly where it comes from. Although it is found in monkeys, the actual reservoirs may be insects, bats, or other creatures. Preston cannot answer this question, because the virologists have yet to come up with an answer themselves.

Easy travel makes it possible that viruses like these will escape from their home range and spread around the world, but the Reston experience is, if anything, reassuring. The virus was successfully contained, and made no inroads among the political elite in Washington DC, who would have made the most tremendous fuss.

Determined readers will emerge from this book knowing a little more about viruses and the complex measures needed to study them in safety. But a book that promises "the most terrifying true story you will ever read" ends in bathos, as it becomes clear that nobody (in America, at least) suffered more than slight inconvenience.

Preston sets out to make the flesh creep, but offers far too little light and shade. A book that aims to thrill like a novel needs to be paced like a novel, but The Hot Zone rushes uncontrollably from sensation to sensation, using adjectives like blunt instruments to belabour its readers, before finally descending into anticlimax.

Richard Ingrams tells Danny Danziger how he sees the portrait of himself in his biography

LORD OF THE GNOMES
By Harry Thompson
Heinemann, £17.50

MY recollection is that Harry brought up the idea of this book at a Private Eye lunch. He said that his publishers wanted him to write another book, and he could not think of anything to write about except me. He asked if I would agree to it. After some humming and hawing, I said yes.

I was quite flattered that he should want to write a book about me, and I wanted to do Harry a good turn, but it is a bit silly in a way, because I am quite young, and I do not regard my life as over by any means.

But I have such a bad memory, I thought I would find this book interesting and that it would be full of things I had forgotten.

Also, I think a biography has to be written by someone who is interested in the subject, which Harry is. He is a great fan of Private Eye, and therefore of me, I suppose. The kind of biographer you would dream is somebody who is just doing it for money. One of the first people Harry went to see was my mother. She showed him her old scrapbooks, and he got on very well with her. I do not think anyone has ever spoken to my mother about me before, although a lot of stuff has been written about me.

He found an old friend of mine who had been in the army with me in Korea, whom I had not seen for ages, and he even spoke to my first girlfriend, Fiona Douglas-Horne.

There were several key people who would not agree to an interview. My wife, who left me about three years ago, refused to talk to him. She rang me to say she did not want anything to do with it. I passed the message on.

Ingrams: "quite flattered"

Christopher Booker would not speak to him, but that was not a surprise. I suspect Booker has a grudge against me, because about 30 years ago I sacked him from the editorship of Private Eye.

Germaine Greer would not co-operate either as we had a row very recently. I still regard her as a friend, but she is a difficult person, as she herself would admit.

Harry gave me the manuscript to look at, and there were a lot of things I objected to, but Harry did not seem to take any notice. For instance, I think the picture he gives of my wife is completely wrong. In the book he says that I was very unhappy in my marriage, which I think is quite false. I do not see it like that at all.

The first few chapters describing my early days are the best bit of the book. I thought all the stuff about my childhood and my family was very interesting. But when it gets on to Private Eye, I am just bored by that. I have read it all before. Who gives a damn really, apart from people at Private Eye?

On the other hand, you could say, well, what else is there to write about?

The book ends on a happy note: of me meeting my new partner and they all lived happily ever after.

I don't regret that the book was done. It was written in a very friendly spirit, and that is rare these days. So much else that has been written about me is a hateful job, because the fact is, once you give up power, as I did with the editorship of Private Eye, everyone sets about attacking you, because you have no retaliation. So it is very nice that somebody should write a friendly biography, and I would stick up for Harry on those grounds alone. And I would give Lord of the Gnomes seven out of ten. 2 which King embroiders his tale of escalating fantasy. What turns the nice guy next door into a psychopathic, murderous wife-beater? Simply the fact of her signing a pro-abortion petition at the local drugstore? Or are we in a cosmic endgame with the fate of the universe in the balance?

In a stroke of brilliance — as well as humanity — King has made his protagonists in this novel those whom the politically correct might term "chronologically challenged", ie, old. His characteristic prose style, toying with the poetic, is coupled with uncomfortably clinical observation on the flawed mechanics of the ageing process and a genius for working details of late 20th-century everyday tat into Gothic fantasy.

Derwent May reviews the critics

Pleasure ratings are awarded to a maximum of five. Column continues indicates the length of reviews to date in national broadsheet newspapers

Survival of Salman: "Salman Rushdie is the subject of an experiment," said John Carey in The Sunday Times. "Take a writer, condemn him to death, force him into exile... and see if his genius survives." Carey was reviewing Rushdie's volume of stories, East, West (Cape, £9.99) — and he was able to report that the genius was "alive and well". It was a "scintillating" collection, with all Rushdie's storytelling powers still apparent — his "ingenuity, wit, charm and restless talent for the unexpected". But Carey had two reservations: he wondered whether Rushdie's ordeal "debars the long concentration a novel requires", and he found the book disappointingly "inoffensive" compared with the "devastating attacks" and "tormented visions" of his earlier work.

In The Observer, Michael Ratcliffe struck a similar note: "The fatwa has compelled a change of voice and directed Rushdie towards intimate, ironic narratives — there is much less pandemonium on the page". But Victoria Glendinning in The Daily Telegraph thought that "reading these tales is like listening to an orchestra humming and tooting and tuning up for a major performance — his next novel, perhaps".

Meanwhile in The Guardian, Homi K. Bhabha of Chicago University brooded on the title of the book: "At a time when writers are concerned with the 'hyphenated' realities of being Afro-Caribbean or Asian-American, East, West furnishes the little room of literature with a voice that rises from the 'common' that both divides and joins East and West." A busy comma, that one. Col cms: 275

Catch-44: Some disappointment at Closing Time (Simon & Schuster, £14.99). Joseph Heller's sequel, 32 years later, to his great Catch-22. "A tired, sad novel," said Nick Hornby in The Sunday Times. Yossarian, the bombardier who once came naked on parade to receive his gallantry medal, is now "the ultimate insider-trader," said Scott Bradfield in The Independent, and "it's not so easy to laugh along with him". Geoff Dyer in The Guardian felt that the book had been "ghosted by the author himself". David Holloway in The Daily Telegraph disagreed. He thought the sequel was "more packed with heroic fantasy, philosophy, jokes, pathos, sheer lunacy than its predecessor, all expressed in Heller's hectic yet marvellously controlled, creamy prose". Melvyn Bragg applauds John Mortimer for his seemingly effortless grasp of success

Mortimer: minimum fuss

"How delightful to read Mr Mortimer
With his wise erudition and wit
And exceedingly well-polished stories
It's a joy, it's a charm."

It's a joy, it's a charm.
It's a joy, it's a charm.
It's a joy, it's a charm.

As if to ward off envy at the guaranteed pleasures to come, John Mortimer puts on a necklace of garlic at the opening of the book and describes a desperate and recurring dream. There is, he is saying, a price to be paid for these comforts and I pay it. Yet he makes sure that we do not.

His anxieties and melancholy are given short shrift. For most of the time we enjoy a carousel of fun, characters, opinions and adventures, taking in criminals, judges, theatrical nabobs, foreigners of several denominations, friends, idyllic family, prejudices and opinions, all touched on with minimum fuss to maximum effect.

His father is still the dominating character, even though he has died well before this volume begins. But Mortimer still lives in his father's house and constantly repeats the magnificent words his father taught him. Perhaps because of that father, he is mildly addicted to eccentricities with a sort of genius — Tony Richardson, Peggy Ramsay and Myfanwy Piper are just three of the dozens of pen portraits of many of those who were most entertainingly contre in English life. He is sympathetic to some murderers, hard on some lawyers, impeccably liberal on, say, prison reform and all laws and practices stacked against liberty and the individual. He is very sensible about writing itself, commending, for instance, the taking up of a real job first, especially one in which the writer "meets people in crises in their lives as doctors, priests and defending barristers do".

He has Rumpoiled us all into admiration — very few characters in English fiction over the past generation compare with television's stumpy legal crusader. Throughout his life, but especially since giving up the Bar (in Singapore), he has written all around the houses — for the opera, for magazines, television, films, the theatre, novels and memoirs. They all flow from him at a success rate which should, by now, have bred a platoon of detractors. That they are so massively outnumbered by his supporters is a tribute to his unique roundedness.

For the Conservatives, he is the acceptable face of Labour. For Labour, he is the comprehensible voice of roast-beef, fox-hunting England. He calls himself "a champagne socialist... an atheist of Christ". His socialism is as much that of Dickens as of Keir Hardie, and his atheism sits happily in the pews of the Church of England near Henley and all's well with the world.

That is the man. Complacency never sets in. He is too thoughtful and cunning to tempt the gods; but he does cross-examine them with humour, with good manners and with persistence.

In this book, as in so much of what he writes, you stick in your thumb and you pull out a plum.

A knight at the opera

Al-Arquaim school in Malaysia, from Abbas/Magnum's Allah O Akbar (Phaidon, £39.99)

SIR Denis Forman's frustrations are now laid out for our examination, as surely as if he were in the psychiatrist's chair. He has been driven nearly to despair by the banal obfuscations of the traditional opera-programme synopses, which should take their place in the gallery of contemporary portraits, along with hi-fi instructions translated from the Japanese, vacuum-packed junk mail and pins in new shirts.

His book is a cry of pain, and for that it is welcome. The cry, however, sometimes becomes a rather repetitive screech, and like the noises from certain sopranos in their twilight times, it can make you uncomfortable even when you do not want it to. Some will think the irritations are worthwhile because the intent is so noble, others may find them indigestible. I swither and then choke.

The point of the thing is clear. He has taken the most popular operas and rendered the plots in plain English, adding notes for the newcomers which are meant to direct the attention to the highlights. These are listed under the heading "Look out for", and as if the description is not enough, Sir Denis has devised a star system for arias and musical moments so that you know which to be especially attentive — so, in Rosencavalier, the Act III trio gets three stars but the overture only one because "it is famous for starting the opera off with an orgasm but honestly if nobody told you, you would never know".

So it is refreshing and infuriating at the same time. As a paid-up member of the Society to Abolish Silly Opera Programmes I cannot but raise a cheer for the disrespectful tone and the effort to explain plots simply and without the contorted syntax which so many programme notes still embrace. But it is wearing.

Each of his accounts begins in the same way. "The one where..." or "The one about..." So Verdi's I Lombardi is "the one with lots of singing crusaders, a hermit in a cave and a brand of mineral water with supernatural powers". And you will want to know that Götterdämmerung is "the one where Siegfried makes new friends who stab him in the back, where Brunnhilde is very brave and Valhalla goes up in flames".

This may be a welcome relief from paragraphs beginning "...and the habit of referring to characters (especially minor ones) by a number of different names and titles in the course of a synopsis, but it grates in its own way. Act II Scene 3 of Die Walküre proceeds like this, we are told: "Hey! Steady! Not so fast, stop! says Siegmund to Sieglinde. 'We're both knackered.' I have seen better renderings. The auto-da-fé scene in Don Carlos is "a good fry-up of heretics". And so on. Yet it is unfair to suggest that the style destroys the exercise altogether, though it seems a strange tone of voice for the distinguished Sir Denis, as if he has taken to listening to rap records in his maturity.

The book is a huge compendium which has enough verve and effervescence to overcome some of the objections. Obviously, coming from a former deputy chairman at Covent Garden and an energetic man of the arts, it is meticulous in its way. Above all it exudes the excitement of opera.

The trouble is that it trips over its own bootlaces. In trying to ridicule some of the more pretentious offerings of those who like to make opera obscure, it is rather patronising to the oew opera audience at which it is presumably aimed. People may find that they grow out of the book rather quickly. They may well remember some of its insights, though, as they move on: after the plot summaries there are some sparky little chapters on singers (snappily with dates of birth, often closely guarded secrets), operatic history, composers, conductors and even producers.

Sir Denis wants to remind everyone that opera should never be about obscuring things but about lifting you onto a different plane where everything is clearer. But he has decided on shock tactics, and even the least precious of readers will not be able to resist a shiver on some pages. For every bravo there will be a boo — perhaps, two. He will be happy with that, because he believes with the best of them that opera should never be comfortable, and in this book he is true to himself.

It is, however, a final testament to the current strength of the PC movement that Hall is already nervously anticipating the likely reaction to his remarks. "As I write, I can hear the thumb screws being unscrewed, the guillotine sharpened, the pages of the Dictionary of Political Correctness being shuffled, the tumbrels beginning to roll."

Early tongues of angels

JILL Paton Walsh was understandably aggrieved when Knowledge of Angels was turned down by publishers who should have known better. She may have been further disgruntled to find herself described under the Booker furor as "a successful writer for children". The phrase has a slightly denigratory air about it, as though such persons are not up to writing real novels or are doing very nicely out of merchandiseable stuff about three-fingered postmen.

Such is emphatically not the case. As a writer for children, Walsh's success has something in common with that of authors such as Peter Dickinson or William Mayne. They write because singular ideas catch their imagination.

Even her early stories, The Dolphin Crossing (1967) and Fireweed (1969) — two books set in the time of the Second World War — were distinguished by an individual stance (not least in the introduction of some swearing, which the publisher excised).

Since then she has shown great versatility in her choice and treatment of themes. There have been unusual picture books, such as her four-book series on children's games, Can I Play?; there have been sunny pastorals such as The Butty Boy (1975) and Gaffer Sampson's Luck (for which she won the 1985 Smarties prize); there has been a remarkably crafted fictive biography of Grace Darling and a succession of tougher stories pushing at the borders of the children's market, but with no concessions to fashionable "books for adolescents".

luon, and A Parcel of Paterns (1983), about the coming of the plague to 17th-century Derbyshire, are stories shadowed by darkness, while her historical novel, The Emperor's Winding Sheet (for which she won a 1974 Whitbread Award), carries first glimmerings of Knowledge of Angels.

Several of Walsh's books are now only available in odd editions, such as textbooks or large-print series. Others are unobtainable, including what some consider her most notable achievement, the linked novellas Goldengrove and Unleaving.

Within this oeuvre, Pepi and the Secret Names must count among the unusual picture books, being not much more than an extended word-game. The schematic text is about an Egyptian painter working on the walls of Prince Dhutmose's proposed tomb. He likes to draw from life, so his son goes out and calls in the wild beasts to have their portraits painted. Their secret names are given in the text in hieroglyphics, and the child reader has the comparatively easy job of translating the Egyptian symbols into English words.

The pictures are a pastiche of Egyptian wall-paintings, a method of illustration at which Fiona French is a dab hand. Indeed, years ago she wrote her own Egyptian picture book, Huni, but that too, needless to say, is out of print.

Eva Hoffman: haunting images

■ EXIT INTO HISTORY
By Eva Hoffman
Minerva, £6.99

In the summers of 1990 and 1991, Eva Hoffman travelled through the new Eastern Europe, rediscovering, amidst the changes, its own, long forbidden past. Talking to writers and waiters, dissidents turned entrepreneurs, taxi drivers, farmers, priests and psychoanalysts, she nurses iceless vodkas in bleak hotels, comes at night to cities dark as villages, watches cows water themselves in lush Hungarian meadows. She listens to filthy children ask for their mothers in a Romanian orphanage and to a cocktail pianist in Bratislava tinkling out "Somewhere over the Rainbow".

Her prose contains images as haunting as any from the great East European films, but Hoffman is essentially an analyst. In Lost in Translation she tenderly explored the dislocation of a single spirit. Here, she seeks to understand both the common and unique experience, the sharp polarity of Us and Them, which both "formed and deformed human character" under Communism.

Now, when everything, as in the West, is open and up for grabs, "Eastern Europe is partly a test of what we stand for". A fine book, addressing vital contemporary issues.

■ THE VICAR OF SORROWS
By A. N. Wilson
Penguin, £5.99

If you have a taste for novels about middle England which are full of repressed middle-class angst and introspection, this is most definitely the novel for you. If, on the other hand, you feel that you cannot stomach yet another love affair conducted to the sound of pealing church bells, then avoid it like the plague. The hero of Wilson's novel is Francis Kreer, a middle-aged vicar who is plunged into depression by the death of his mother. Bereavement proves the catalyst for a series of changes in Kreer's life which cause him to break with all the conventions of church and family life. The portrayals of snobishness and the petty rivalries of country parishes are more convincing than the vicar's emotional turmoil.

■ TELL ME HOW LONG THE TRAINS BEEN GONE
By James Baldwin
Penguin, £7.99

Published two months after the assassination of Martin Luther King, this erratic novel burns with the fires of racial conflict. Black actor Leo is adrift in a corrupt and bewildering New York. The whites whom he encounters are bullying, nefarious and dispiritingly obstructive. Enraged, Leo concludes that violence offers the only possibility of freedom. Baldwin's vision, so luminous in his earlier writings, is here pessimistic and crude. But the novel is valuable for its illumination of the struggles of the civil rights activists.

■ THE FABER BOOK OF ESPIONAGE
Edited by Nigel West
Faber, £9.99

When Rupert Allason MP missed last year's vote on Maastricht, he was probably too busy finishing this latest work published under his pseudonym, Nigel West. Although this anthology of memoirs, fiction and opinion by secret service workers is gargantuan, it covers only this century. Though there are some great tales by the likes of Fleming and Maugham to be dipped into here, West has also included some pretty dreary stuff. Guy Burgess's essay on the Labour Party, for instance, is hardly required reading for the espionage fanatic.

Political correctness has managed to offend both Left and Right

I COUNTED 12 uses of either "PC" or "politically correct" in last Sunday's papers. They were all vaguely pejorative and applied to everything from Tony Blair's relationship with his children to a new type of biodegradable water bottle. This hardly makes life easy for Sarah Dunant and her contributors, who are anxious to nail the term down so that they may properly debate its political and personal implications. But even in these pages there are some awkward disagreements. Nobody goes so far as to take up the question of PC and biodegradable bottles, but there are big differences between the minimalists, who concentrate on PC as a corrective to conventional language — the replacement of "he" by "he/she" — and those who see the term as shorthand for a new cultural relativism which knows no absolutes in literature or philosophy.

What brings the book to life is the evidence it provides of what Dunant calls PC's "remarkable double whammy": its capacity to offend both the Right and a good deal of the Left at the same time. And nobody on the left seems more offended than Melanie Phillips. In an essay called

■ THE WAR OF THE WORDS: The Political Correctness Debate
Edited by Sarah Dunant
Virago Press, £7.99

"Liberal Liberalism", she tells the detailed story of how her defence of traditional educational standards and classic texts in The Guardian brought down upon her the wrath of an "intellectual lynch mob" of cultural relativists. She is not even prepared to credit those who attacked her views on language and literature with good intentions. Their concerns were less "to protect the ostensible targets of prejudice — black people, women or whomsoever — than to demonstrate the moral purity of the expurgators".

Phillips has no doubts about the penetration of the PC movement. On the basis of "enquiring around" a number of university social work departments, she discovered that unless staff and students "confessed to their own racism, they would be persecuted until they did so". This sweeping assertion has to be set alongside John Annette's rather gentler conclusion from a survey of American campuses that it is an "exaggeration" to say that "the teaching of the curriculum has been substantially altered by advocates of PC", and Lisa Jardine's insistence that she has "yet to encounter one real-life example of bowdlerising of classic books in the name of PC".

It is a relief to find a calm and balanced essay by Stuart Hall as the backdrop for the volume. He argues that such a concentration upon language alone is an example of the mistaken belief that "if things are called by a different name they will cease to exist". It may be valuable to examine the assumptions built into our use of language but "trying to get people collectively to change their behaviour towards minorities is one thing, and telling them what they can and cannot say is something altogether different".

It is, however, a final testament to the current strength of the PC movement that Hall is already nervously anticipating the likely reaction to his remarks. "As I write, I can hear the thumb screws being unscrewed, the guillotine sharpened, the pages of the Dictionary of Political Correctness being shuffled, the tumbrels beginning to roll."

A surreal black and white illustration. In the foreground, a car with a hamburger-shaped body is shown from a front-three-quarter view. The car has a large, round, textured top (the bun) and a dark, rectangular grille area with two small, dark, rectangular eyes. It has four small, round wheels. To the right of the car is a shopping cart filled with various groceries, including a large bunch of bananas, a loaf of bread, and other items. In the background, a person is sitting in a car, and there are some indistinct shapes and textures. The overall style is grainy and high-contrast, with a dreamlike or absurdist theme.

Elton John began his rise to fame in one, ICI runs a fleet of them a quarter of a mile underground in one of Britain's salt mines, and a light-weight version holds the world record for jumping over cars.

It is almost 30 years since the Ford Transit van first took to the road, during which time it has become a motoring legend with an image for rough-neck street-cred, a byword for just about any dented van that's about to carve you up and, like Hoover and Filofax, a household name.

Now the Transit has passed into the record books. The three million Transit has just rolled out of Ford's Southampton plant to make it far and away the most successful van of its kind in Britain.

For its latest model, Ford has cleaned up Transit's street-fighter image with a sleek, aerodynamic look, dashboard instruments from the Mondeo saloon, CD player, anti-lock brakes, holders for bottles of mineral water, and the cleanest, "greenest" diesel engines ever put in a van. Prices start at a basic £9,995 for the Transit 80 model.

And, to replace the old Transit bus model, there is a new, classy, people-carrier called the Tourneo, which starts from £15,395.

The Transit has progressed a lot from the box-shaped vans launched in 1965 and which are etched in the memory for the black diesel smoke billowing from the exhaust and bodywork that always seemed to have just emerged from a gun battle. Other road users soon learned which Transits to avoid: the ones fitted with rubber wings to save operators the trouble of repairing the knocks and scrapes.

On its way to its new velvety appearance, the Transit has been chequered, past. Elton John may spend more time in private jets and limousines now, but as keyboard player Reg Dwight with the Long John Baldry band, an early "Tranny" was his and the band's favoured transport. The legend was launched when Baldry's manager, Barry Lawrence, put the band into a Transit, "because I got fed up with being overtaken by them".

In Cheshire, a fleet of Transits work at the bottom of the ICI salt mine, covering the 2½-mile route from surface to liftshaft. The Swiss converted Transits to run on rails like trains, and a blood-red model was blessed in 1966 by the Bishop of London when it became the breakdown vehicle for the 59 Club, founded by the Vicar of St Mary's Paddington, in London, for young motorists.

Transits have also enjoyed a sporting life. In 1985, a Transit driven by a stuntman leapt over 15 parked cars and a diesel Transit entered the record books by covering 5,000 miles at the Monza motor race circuit in Italy at an average of 74.64mph.

The Transit was designed and built as a replacement for Ford's T-Series 400E, which was made in Britain, and the Taurus Transit, which was assembled in Germany. The idea was to produce a van that was as easy to drive as a car, rather than being a noisy and uncomfortable scaled-down truck.

The millionth Transit was built a decade after launch and the two million mark reached in 1985. Now the total is three million and going strong, which is good news for hauliers but not so great for the more timid motorists among us.

The Transit is no van ordinaire and its drivers are not ordinary motorists. It's the sight every rush-hour motorist dreads in the rear-view mirror as, panel-bashed and weaving, the looming Transit carves through the crush.

Now, though, there's the comfort of knowing that inside the non-nonsense outside is an environmentally clean engine, a comfy cab and somewhere to store the Evian.

VAUGHAN FREEMAN

Ford's sleek new Transit van, with all mod cons for the driver

Emma Hope, the shoe designer, and her D-reg VW Polo van

THE shoe designer Emma Hope likes driving but laments having ruined many pairs of velvet boots while using her VW Polo van.

How did you first learn to drive?

I was 16 years old, my mother had gone out and I decided to try driving our white Mini around the garden — and got stranded in the middle of the lawn. I telephoned a friend for help and ran back and forth from the phone to carry out his instructions. My mother arrived back puzzled to find me brushing the lawn with a stiff brush. As soon as I was 17 my father started teaching me, but I also took lessons and passed the test first time.

What was your first car?

A silver Mini with a sunshine roof. I was so proud driving around London in it. Then someone drove into it and wrote it off.

What do you drive now and why?

I've had my D-reg Polo van since 1987. It has been great for carrying masses of shoes around but it's not exactly impressive to look at. Two months ago I had windows put in the back and it's no longer like driving around in a dark coffin.

Do you enjoy driving?

Yes, when I have a really nice new tape to listen to, such as the Neville Brothers. I'll turn the sound up and play it over and over again — and the sound drowns out any disturbing noises from under the bonnet.

What is your dream car?

Anything without a roof that makes you feel like you're in a rocket.

What is your most hated car? The top-of-the-range Ford Granada

STEERING COLUMN

is a bit soulless, but it is nice being driven to the airport in one.

What is your worst driving habit? Driving with my knees when I'm tying my hair up.

What infuriates you most about other drivers? That they are there at all... and people like me who cannot resist sneaking past in the inside lane.

What is the most unusual thing you have done in your car? Driven along with chestnut trees (designed for my roof garden) sticking out of the windows.

If you were Secretary of State for Transport, what is the first thing you would do? I'd halt all motorway development and improve existing roads.

What is your must hated car advert? The Corsa one, with Naomi Campbell and the other supermodels sitting on demolition balls: it made them all look grumpy and foolish, even though I think it was trying to appeal to the female market. To me, it looked like they were being manipulated by the sexist views of the car and advertising industries.

GAP YEAR: Many people take time out after their A-levels or when changing jobs to travel the world...

Indonesia from a train window is sticky, cheap and never-ending. It is made noisier by the vendors who invade at every station, and more alarming by the children who play on the tracks, dashing out from a tangle of shacks, washing lines, liner and banana trees. But then you get beyond the towns to gentler scenes, such as the fields ploughed by oxen, and the rice terraces tended by women bent double in drenched skirts and wearing coolie hats. Spectacularly green, the fields swirl across the hills like layers of lace.

This summer's vegetation on one island was slightly duller than usual. The palm trees were coated in a layer of dust — a sign, the local people said, of activity in the volcanoes that rise blue in the distance. Later we climbed them at dawn, feeling the ground shake as black clouds exploded from the craters and red-hot rocks crashed across the slopes.

Travellers have worn a standard route across the archipelago. This owes a lot to the Lonely Planet guide Indonesia, a spin-off from Tony Wheeler's South-East Asia on a Shoestring. Most travellers dutifully pack the guide, dependent yet resentful, as one would be of an ever-present parent. Yet the guide is as random and subjective as any, and there are plenty of opportunities to cut your own path.

Reducing Indonesia to any kind of formula is, in any case, a waste of time. Made up of five main islands and 30 smaller archipelagos totalling 13,677 islands (6,000 of which are inhabited), Indonesia is an embroglio of ethnic types, religions, tribes, languages and cultures. What's more, it is rioting, striking and shooting its way towards greater democracy. The Jakarta Post, the English language newspaper, provides a glimpse. Visitors, by chance, might come across tortured Indonesian subversives who can fill in bits of what's missing from the censored press.

Travellers with time, and you need lots, start in Sumatra, heading south through Java, Bali and the Nusa Tenggara chain, then perhaps heading north to Sulawesi (known here as Celebes) or Borneo. Eastern islands, such as Flores, Timor and Irian Jaya, are becoming more accessible, and those who get that far can feel they are escaping the tourist haul.

But even the more conventional destinations have long to go before they reach their Best Before dates. Bali remains genuinely captivating, despite the number of tourists, and in northern Java I visited villages where no westerner had previously set foot. The south-western peninsula of Sulawesi is fascinating, and the part of that island most often visited, but Britons have yet to make it a priority.

I flew into Java at Jakarta, the capital and most aggressive and suspicious of Indonesian cities. Glossy towerblocks leer over stomach-churning slums, the public transport caters for every category of Death Wish Anonymous, and tourists plan their escapes.

I made it across to Yogyakarta ("Jogja"). This is Indonesia's shopping zone — mainly leather goods, jewellery and batik — and shopping is a scene from The Life of Brian. Ask a price and they say, "25,000 rupiah but you can bargain," and the whole exchange collapses into giggles.

I spent my wisest fiver on Java at a performance of the Ramayana ballet, open air at the Prambanan temples. The dancing is among Indonesia's greatest assets, whether performed by small children, lithe teenagers or elderly women. All are released from the conventions of their ages, transformed by classic poses into images of mesmerising grace. The shadow puppet plays are less accessible: foreigners are issued incomprehensible translations of the plots.

I grabbed my batik-patterned handbag and flew on to Bali, that legendary paradise. Distressingly, the first stop after the airport is not the white or black sand beaches fringed by coral, or the sculpted hillsides scattered generously with Hindu shrines. No, it's Kuta.

Why do Australians go to Kuta when they have such good beaches at home? This is a place where Japanese tourists gather to applaud the sunset and Indonesian students of tourism research their theses on how not to design a resort. Kuta is so bad it's almost trendy, and worth a visit if only for the local boys with Australian accents doing Indonesian vendor-spiel at its best: "Where you from? What's your name? How old are you? You're beautiful, you want gigolo? Marijuana? You wanna buy a sarong?"

Most travellers pass swiftly on to Ubud, an arty, village hang-out with roads lined by galleries and ticket touts. The surrounding villages are stuffed with temples and the gorges with mini-jungles, waterfalls and bathing pools.

Leaving Ubud, we waited hours while the bus filled up with passengers crammed along narrow seats and the aisle packed with cardboard boxes, chickens and the latest rice harvest. Our backpacks were tied to the roof with half a dozen haystacks, while the bus grunted its way, belching black smoke and loud music.

My strongest memories of Indonesia are not the one-off wonders of the guide books but impressions of warm evenings on verandahs hung with caged birds, of candlelit night markets and mobbing by manic children: of arriving in villages still not lit by electricity. It is a cliché to add, "And the people are absolutely the best" but, hell, the people are absolutely the best. It is all so sociable, and so ridiculously cheap.

Adventures with a backpack

DAN ROBERTS (19)

Travelling around France, Greece and Italy for three weeks in August on a budget of £10 a day was this backpacker's choice of adventure. His Inter-Rail card cost £209 for a month and covered two areas of Europe: France, Belgium, Luxembourg and Holland, and Italy, Greece and Turkey. He says:

"I left Bristol at three o'clock on the morning of the first day of the holiday and travelled for 27 hours before arriving at Marseille. The first stop on our itinerary. It was exhausting. After this experience, I quickly got used to sleeping in very uncomfortable places — this is the only way to survive such intensive travelling."

"I travelled with four other people, which was almost too many, but we avoided a lot of potential arguments by carefully planning our route before we left. Sometimes we had to be flexible about these plans — places that sound unspoiled and tourist-free in the guide book can turn out to be obscure villages with nothing to see, except goats, and have nowhere for visitors to stay."

"We usually slept in campsites or arranged our journeys so that we could spend the night on the train (cheap and relatively comfortable). Youth hostels were all packed in August and much more expensive, so we avoided them. Wherever we were, I always slept with my money and passport at the bottom of my sleeping bag. We met people who had lost everything — students on trains seem to be easy targets."

"Our tickets were valid for a month but we ran out of money and energy before the ticket expired. We saw a huge amount during the trip: Rome, Pisa, Vienna, Venice, Florence, Cannes and parts of Greece, but we couldn't have kept up our enthusiasm for sightseeing much longer."

ANNA RENTON (22)

Before going to university, Anna Renton bought a round-the-world air ticket and spent seven and a half months travelling by herself to India, Indonesia, Australia, and North and South America. She was on a budget of £5-£12 a day. She says:

"Apart from the occasional family holiday, I had never travelled before I set out on this trip and was very apprehensive about embarking on such an ambitious journey. What worried me most was the prospect of being lonely, and the dangers of travelling as a single woman."

"Being by myself turned out to be an ideal way to travel. I was lonely only occasionally — it was worst at the beginning and when I got ill. I was never alone for long stretches because I made a real effort to meet people; if I wanted company I travelled with them. I didn't lose touch with my family — I picked up letters from poste restantes and sent home extracts from my diary."

"Being a woman alone was more of a problem and was something that I was conscious of throughout the trip. I never felt physically threatened, though I was careful to avoid obviously dangerous situations. The constant stream of slightly rude comments in South America and Asia made me angry and I felt myself becoming more aggressive in response. Ultimately, these irritations were just something I had to put up with."

"I've travelled by myself again since this trip and will do again. There's an element of selfishness in wanting to travel alone, but you are so much freer when you are able to make your own decisions."

"Travelling on such a large scale is very time-consuming and seven and a half months wasn't long enough. If I were to do it again, I don't think I'd try to take on so much."

LUCY WILLIAMS (21)

Three months' backpacking around South America was Lucy Williams's idea of travel adventure. She says:

"We didn't have a firm, planned itinerary and were flexible about how the trip developed. This was exciting in that we felt footloose, but in retrospect it might have been more sensible to have had a firmer plan, because we did waste time retracing our steps."

"We went by coach most of the time; this costs about $1.50 an hour. The distances we covered, especially in Chile, were so huge that the costs mounted up, but I'd planned to spend about $20 a day and this was enough. I only needed to use my credit card once."

"Most of the time I was travelling with a friend who spoke good Spanish, which made everything much easier. We took obvious security precautions: we wore money-belts and disguised our backpacks in grain sacks so they didn't look too ostentatious."

"I only felt really threatened once — when we got caught up in a big political demonstration in Bolivia."

Willing hands reach out across the globe

A friend warned me: "You do realise that if you see what they get up to you might not want to go." He was referring to my impending visit to a Raleigh International expedition in Zimbabwe. Coincidentally, my 18-year-old daughter had just passed one of the British charity's notorious selection weekends (no sleep, no skin your own lunch), so a working trip to some of its 11 environmental, community, and scientific projects in Zimbabwe was bound to be of personal interest.

Harare provides the base for Raleigh's expanding southern Africa programme, which includes Botswana, Namibia and, coming soon, Uganda. Development projects have also been established in South America, south-east Asia, Alaska and Russia. "Development" is a key word in Raleigh's philosophy of combining the personal growth of young people with the 1990s ethic of doing something useful.

John Blashford-Snell founded the organisation (best known as Operation Raleigh) ten years ago as a quasi-military character-building operation. The dawn-rising and mess tins are still high profile, as is the adventure element of treks and watersports, such as diving and whitewater rafting, but these now revolve around the building of a clinic in a remote village or helping conservationists collect research data.

The new-look Raleigh is something between a yomp and a romp. "I think what I'm getting out of it will emerge in years to come," says Robert Jones, a newly qualified teacher on the first five-week expedition to Zimbabwe, introduced this year as an alternative to the usual ten weeks.

"Just being part of this venture and working with people of such high calibre has already boosted my self-confidence. I shall certainly be using the experience in the classroom."

It could be argued that the main part of Raleigh's four challenges is out the expedition, not using what you have learned, nor even the selection weekend, but raising the required £3,000, albeit with the help of a nationwide network of support groups. Five-weekers have to raise "only" £1,800. Those picked for the Youth Development Programme (YDP), an initiative to help youngsters from difficult backgrounds, raise about half this amount.

The 119 venturers (the name given to volunteers) in Zimbabwe were split into groups of a dozen, with most groups including a few YDP international and commercially sponsored participants. The pack is given a reshuffle after the first three weeks and reselect for a further three: those who had been building waterholes in Hwange National Park, for instance, or extending elephant trails for trekkers in the Mavuradonha wilderness area, were moved to a community project.

Raleigh works closely with organisations such as SEE (Surgical Eye Expeditions) International, an American charity which organises operations on simple disorders such as cataracts, and the Save the Children Fund's Farin Health Workers Scheme, which aims to improve medical care for workers on uninterrupted sleep. I was glad my brother lived nearby, because I could not have driven home."

Venturers selected for an expedition must raise the funds to pay for their trip. This is typically about £3,000, but some venturers may get help from their employers: the AA, Inland Revenue, Remploy, British Rail, British Steel and Unilever are among the organisations which encourage employees to apply. Advice is given on fund-raising, including jumble sales and sponsored bungee jumps.

The third part of the Raleigh challenge is the expedition itself; the country's large maize, tobacco and cotton farms, as well as government departments. Venturers provide most of the labour.

This brought me to a question. I wanted to know: why does southern Africa need brigades of young First Worlders to lay bricks or hack at the undergrowth? Why can't Zimbabweans install their own plumbing?

Out in the bush I could see why: lack of money, motivation and expertise. The changes brought about by a dozen willing pairs of hands were evidently not just physical; awareness is heightened, too. On all sides.

At Godzi, a remote and typical baked-earth village in the Umfuli communal lands, Raleigh was on its fifth expedition to build a clinic. The value of the project was underlined when a young girl limped on to the site where the surgery in her amputation had come undone and she had walked about ten miles to seek out help. Without the Godzi clinic, she would have had to struggle on to the next clinic, another ten miles away.

Involvement at Godzi, as at many sites, has extended beyond the job in hand. I watched two venturers teaching "Kumbaya" and "Clementine" to a packed class at the village school. Experiencing "real" Africa was what most venturers voted the top advantage of an expedition over a holiday or aimless backpacking.

The Zimbabwe expedition leader, Ben Clayton-Jolly, a 31-year-old former Army officer and instructor with Outward Bound, recounted how a nine-day camping trek in the isolated Chimanimani mountains, part of the adventure phase, had produced "tears of apprehension" in some venturers.

"It's mainly a physical challenge but it's also psychologically daunting. Some of them didn't think they could cope. When they returned, they were hollow-cheeked with exhaustion but absolutely buzzing with excitement because they had done it."

So, now that I have seen what they get up to, how do I feel about my daughter joining them? A Swiss Army penknife and a head torch will be going in her Christmas stocking this year.

Max Vaughan, a trainee accountant from Derby, admits to not feeling fulfilled by the first project undertaken by his group, the Weeds, in the heart of the dense Macchiabe Forest a mile or so from Alexander Falls on Mauritius.

This is where the dodo lived and died. Three hundred years later, other species of birds are in danger of extinction, notably the echo parakeet, the rarest bird in the world. Unique to Mauritius, only 20 parakeets exist in the wild, with a few more in captivity, though as yet the birds have not responded as well as other species to captive breeding programmes. To exacerbate the problem, only five of the 20 remaining wild birds are female.

A main cause of their decline is the loss of natural habitat, and Mr Vaughan was spending ten weeks doing something about it before returning home to join the accountants Peal Marwick.

"We were the first group into the forest and had the worst weather you can imagine. It never stopped raining. I lived in a large tent side by side with ten people I didn't know, spending all day doing back-breaking work in the rain and the mud, finishing at 6pm, eating in bed by 8pm, getting up at 6am the next day and dragging on wet clothes... and the work we were doing just didn't mean much to me."

The group's job was to clear the invasive guava plants from the forest, an essential part of restoring the natural habitat for the echo parakeet and the endangered pink pigeon and other birds. The guava was introduced to Mauritius by man, and has spread even more than rats, monkeys and other pests. The guava grows quickly and thickly, just a few inches apart, and high, reaching into the canopy making it impenetrable for birds.

We climbed one day to the highest point of the island, Mr Vaughan said, "and when we looked down, all we could see was miles of guava."

The guava-clearing project was being undertaken for the Mauritius Wildlife Appeal Fund (MWAF), which was founded in 1984 and is partly funded by Gerald Durrell's Jersey Wildlife Preservation Trust, whose emblem is the dodo. MWAF workers had already shown that by clearing small areas of forest, the birds and endemic plants will return to repopulate the area and live together in the balance that had been established before man arrived.

MWAF's problem was manpower, which Raleigh International provided.

see at first was rain, guava, machetes and mud. "Then one day," he said "we went with some of the MWAF workers and saw pink pigeons living in an area that had been cleared. That gave me a really good feeling about the work, because then I could see what it was achieving."

The importance of this sense of achievement is confirmed by Carl Jones, the Welsh ornithologist who almost single-handedly has saved the rare Mauritius kestrel from extinction.

In 1974, the kestrel population was down to four birds, which were too young to breed. In 1979, when Mr Jones arrived in Mauritius, it was the island's kestrel which was then the world's rarest bird. Today there are 250 wild kestrels and Mr Jones can now safely end his programme of releasing captive-bred birds.

"You don't need millions of pounds to save a species from extinction," he said, "just tender, loving care. To have the Raleigh people here has cost the government nothing. If you're concerned about what we're doing to the planet, you can feel frustrated: you want to do something, but what? Raleigh shows people that they can do something."

Although we will set sail with a planned schedule, experience has shown us over the years that in order to achieve the most exciting expedition cruise, it may be advantageous to change the day's schedule following a local reconnaissance, a change in weather or perhaps a polar bear or whale sighting. Nowhere is this policy more likely to bring rewards than in the Arctic where nature in its purest form will reveal highlights after unexpected highlights.

Of course the scenery is stunning but for most the striking aspect will be the extraordinary flora and fauna, particularly beyond the Arctic Circle where the tundra suddenly bursts into vivid colour. Wildflowers dot an often otherwise austere landscape and sealard colonies crowd onto narrow ledges such as on the cliffs of Bear Island.

As we venture further north to Spitzbergen we will search for reindeer, fox, walrus, and the most majestic of all Arctic inhabitants the Polar Bear. Ice conditions will dictate how far up the west coast of Spitzbergen we might sail but with our four days of exploration we should achieve much in this area which is nothing short of spectacular.

THE ITINERARY

DAY 1 Edinburgh (Leith) Embark on the MS Alla Tarasova in the late afternoon and sail out into the Firth of Forth.

DAY 2 At sea

DAY 3 Fair Isle Spend the morning on Fair Isle visiting the Bird Observatory and walking perhaps meeting some of the 50 or so islanders. Sail during lunch to Shetland and the port of Lerwick on South Mainland. Visit Jarlshof and see the remains of 3000 years of settlement from the Stone Age, through the Bronze and Iron Ages to Viking times.

DAYS 4 & 5 At sea

DAY 6 Rost Island, Lofoten On the outer limits of the Lofoten we shall find the Rost group, a wild area and excellent for bird spotting, puffins, black guillemots and Kittiwakes are particularly plentiful. In the morning visit the village on Rost, the old church is worth seeing. In the afternoon with the aid of our Zodiacs we will visit the bird sanctuary on Lofoten Island.

DAY 7 Reine, Lofoten Islands Here in the heart of the Lofoten we will find breathtakingly beautiful fjords and fairytale villages such as Reine. Above we will visit the Fishing Museum in nearby So and also see "Bird Mountain". The remainder of the day will be spent sailing past the lovely scenery.

DAY 8 Tromsø Spend the morning in the largest town in the Arctic visiting its fine Arctic Museum and 19th century cathedral. Sail during lunch to Fagloya on Nord Island, suitably named nesting site for thousands of Puffins. Weather permitting we will sail close to sheer-sided islands for observation.

DAY 9 Bear Island Although probably known to the Vikings, Bear Island was officially discovered by Willem Barrens in 1596 when searching for the North East passage for a trade route to China. This isolated, often mist shrouded remote island is home to a multitude of fulmars, Kittiwakes, guillemots and gulls. Going ashore by Zodiac we will have the chance for short walks among the lovely Arctic flowers.

DAYS 10, 11, 12 & 13 Spitzbergen Here only 600 miles from the North Pole we shall sail the deep

BACKPACKING on a budget, the 1990s equivalent of the Grand Tour, has become almost obligatory. Peer pressure, if not genuine curiosity puts us on that flight to Kathmandu, just as in centuries before it pushed young gentlemen towards the Mediterranean.

Travel companies for backpackers, such as STA Travel, Trailfinders, Campus Travel and Travelbag, have responded with discounted tickets and special products. Round-the-world tours — flight tickets mixed and matched to customers' preferences — are popular, starting at £700.

Do not be disheartened if it seems that the world has been covered, that every destination is passed. "You can visit a usual destination and do something unusual," says the travel writer, Christina Dowdell.

Itineraries should be flexible, allowing detours to unmissable sites or for unforeseen disasters. "Be a leaf blown by the wind," says Hilary Bradt, the tour leader and travel publisher. Ms Dowdell agrees, but emphasises the value of thorough research, "so you can decide where you want to be blown" and avoiding, for example, hours or days waiting for a bus in a city you just don't want to see.

Fortunately, travel research is easy. Book shops and libraries have a range of maps and guides. The staple guidebooks are the Lonely Planets, Rough Guides and Let's Go Guides, plus Bradt Publications' series which goes further off the beaten track.

AFTER deciding where to go, there is the matter of whether to get there alone or accompanied. The travel purists always go solo, banking on fewer distractions and greater contact with the locals. Others, however, point out that travelling alone can be intimidating, especially for first timers.

A good compromise is to start off by establishing some kind of base, maybe a few weeks at a work camp or kibbutz, where you can adjust to abnormal surroundings, and meet and join up with like-minded people.

Women travellers tend to be seen as a special group, to be bombarded with warnings of "dangers", and lists of basic dress codes and behaviour. The general consensus is that the risks are exaggerated.

Next on the checklist is money. Don't be too paranoid about being ripped off: the difference is usually negligible when translated into sterling. The more serious risk is that you just won't take enough.

The most angst-ridden issue for travellers is what not to take. "Travel incredibly light," says Tim Severin, the expedition leader and writer. Items to take include: torch; antiseptic; sensible shoes; jacket; Visa card; scissors or penknife; photocopies of passport, tickets and insurance; all-size sink plug; sarong; and camera bag. Don't take: too many clothes; the wrong clothes (jeans are heavy and difficult to wash); and a six-month supply of shampoo and suntan lotion. Asia does have chemist shops.

NORTH AMERICA: Part five of The Times weekly guide to the leading ski resorts around the world

American dream skiing

More skiers go to North America than to any other continent. The issue of quality skiing is ubiquitous. The lifts are faster, the queue management is a marvel of courtesy and efficiency. In terms of avalanches and collisions, and for children, America is miles safer.

Not everybody can afford to go to North America, and it takes a long time to get there, but ten hours in the air can be less stressful than four hours on a Saturday afternoon fighting for baggage in Geneva airport, followed by a three to five-hour coach transfer.

Lift tickets in the US are the most expensive in the world, but an analysis of six-day lift-pass prices in Austria and Canada indicates an average of £107 for Austria, and no more than £109 for Canada's top tickets.

European resorts are barred from developing new terrain and installing new lifts, harassed by environmental lobby groups and hemmed in by narrow valley walls. North America, on the other hand, is planning not only new trails but entirely new mountains.

CANADA

Banff/Lake Louise, Alberta

LAKE Louise is Canada's largest skiing area, only 40 minutes by shuttle bus from Banff. The scenery in this sector of the Canadian Rockies plus Colorado to shame. Big horn sheep lick salt off the highway, and elk browse right outside hotel doors.

Hotels are as impressive as the peaks. Banff Springs is an 850-room monument to "Scottish baronial" style. Chateau Lake Louise, only somewhat less mammoth, sits along the lake looking out at glaciers hanging down black rock faces. The resorts of Mystic Ridge (long, steep bumps) and Sunshine (skiing on the continental divide in guaranteed natural snow) share a ski pass with Lake Louise.

Whistler, British Columbia

TWO lift companies at Whistler Resort share a dual mountain ski pass. Whistler, the mountain first developed, has an old-fashioned feel. Blackcomb is state-of-the-art lifts and grooming. Respectively, Blackcomb and Whistler have the longest vertical drops in North America. Whistler Village links the two mountain-lift networks. Car-free and congenial, its European ambience is deliberate. The resort is spoilt for choice with elegant hotels such as the Chateau Whistler, not to mention the best sushi bars this side of the Pacific.

AMERICA

Aspen, Colorado

ASPEN has a reputation as a snobby, jet-set resort with a Lear in every corral. In fact, it is the most attractive ski town in the world, with more genuine "culture" and a higher average IQ than any American city. Aspen has an opera house, several classical music radio stations, cafe bookshops which stay open until midnight, and a taxi driver who does cabaret in his cab. An Aspen lift ticket covers four resorts. Snowmass, 12 miles down the road, is an enormous intermediate paradise, with exceptional facilities for children. Tiehack is a super-easy beginner area. Aspen Highlands, a "cult" area for the hard core, has two new chairlifts. Aspen itself is a perfect ski mountain, a mix of both technical challenge and scenery — all too often, however, admired by all too many.

Vail, Colorado

VAIL has evolved customer satisfaction into an art form. The village is car-free, with efficient, free buses. The slopes are groomed impeccably and the multitudinous chairlifts are high speed. Maybe it is the clientele who lack soul. The Back Bowls of Vail are ungroomed terrain which salvage the resort's skiing cred. On the same lift pass is the ultra-groomed intermediate paradise of Beaver Creek. There is nowhere better for children.

Squaw Valley, California

WHERE else in the world can a skier stroll down to the docks in the morning and commute to the slopes in a paddle-wheel steamer across Lake Tahoe? The skiing is extensive, acres of groomed runs and killer chutes too. As for lift queues: wait longer than ten minutes and a full refund is issued on the spot. There is no real residential centre at Squaw, which means shutting back to the neon, gambling and night-time entertainment of the Tahoe towns.

Jackson Hole, Wyoming

JACKSON is a cowboy town where Colorado dudes are considered sissies. Same goes for the skiing. Although Jackson Hole, the ski area and resort complex, is only 12 miles from downtown Jackson, the trip by shuttle bus can take an hour. Car hire is inexpensive in America and an excuse to drive 40 miles over John Ford Western countryside to Grand Targhee, a gem of a family resort where the powder snow is even deeper than at Jackson Hole. There is no place better to shop for boots or pearl-handled .45s.

Sun Valley, Idaho

THE difficulty of access to the remote Sawtooth mountains of southern Idaho keeps the numbers down. Six high-speed chairlifts have recently been added, and this year 54 acres of new skiing terrain allow Sun Valley to boast "more vertical skiing in less time than at any resort in North America". Sun Valley is also one of the most attractive resorts for non-skiers.

Taos, New Mexico

TAOS is high in Pueblo Indian country, with a decorative style and an ethos which is unique in America. The skiing is tough, the clientele unusual.

Smooth US operators

IN THIS survey of tour operators, prices include flights, air transfers within North America, ground transfers and accommodation. Meals are not included in North American price packages unless otherwise stated. Ski passes, ski hire and insurance can be arranged by tour operators, but are not included in package prices. The price range indicated is for the least expensive week in January and the most expensive week in February.

● Powder Byrnes (071-223 0601, fax 071-223 1491). Canadian ex-racers Ken Read and Dave Irwin have teamed up with Britain's former downhill champion Konrad Bartelski to produce the best introduction to Canada on the market. Business-class flights, a day of helicopter skiing, three days Master Class lessons in the Irwin clinic, all ski passes, meals, hotel accommodation and transfers around the Banff/Lake Louise resorts for ten days, from £1,510. A 12-day programme including Whistler starts at £1,734.

● Ski Scott Dunn (081-767 0202, fax 081-767 2026). With only 150 skiers per season in its only American destination, Scott Dunn is nonetheless the most highly regarded operator in Jackson Hole, with the most comprehensive on-ground services. From £685 to £715.

● Frontier Ski (071-839 1627, fax 071-839 5761). This small firm with only 400 clients is pioneering little-known Canadian resorts Silver Star, Panorama and Big White — all worth exploration. But most Frontier clients still prefer Whistler. From £545 (hotel room with car hire) to £809.

● Crystal (081-399 5144, fax 081-399 6378). Far and away the major player in North America, Crystal takes 10,000 skiers to 15 American and three Canadian resorts. From £221 (hotel room sleeping four) in Banff to £795 in the Aspen Club Lodge in Aspen.

● Virgin Ski (0293 61781, fax 0293 536957). Non-stop flights to Los Angeles with connections to the Lake Tahoe resorts and Mammoth have attracted 3,500 skiers to Virgin. From £599 to £649.

● Ski the American Dream (081-552 1201, fax 081-552 7726). With 20 North American resorts on both coasts, carries around 3,000 skiers to the US and 1,000 to Canada. From £520 to £1,300.

ASTRAGAL

(b) In Architecture, a small moulding, of semicircular section, sometimes plain, sometimes carved with leaves or cut into beads, placed round the top or bottom of columns, and used to separate the different parts of the architrave in ornamental carvings. From the Greek astragalos, the knuckle-bone, used for dicing. The bones when very small become astragals.

CURRAWONG

(a) The native name in Australia for a bird of the genus Sturnira, from the Aboriginal name. "Birds of the night genus, Sturnira, are variously known as bell-shrikes or black magpies, as well as by the Aboriginal name of 'currawong' in New South Wales and Queensland."

DOCIMASY

(a) The art or practice of ascertaining metallic ores, i.e. of separating the metallic substance from foreign substances, and determining the nature and quantity of constituent metal; also the art of ascertaining the properties and qualities of drugs. From the Greek dokimasia, examination, the noun of dokimazo to examine. "Carpenter can be of no consequence in human destiny."

DOSSIL

(a) A plug for a barrel, a spigot; also a plug of flint or rag for stopping a wound, a pledge. From the medieval Latin dossilis, the diminutive of dux, a little leader. "I dreamed the Bone with Dossile dreg in a new-haid Egg."

WALES: Explore the length of the river Wye, from its source in the mountains to its meeting with the Severn

Down the long and winding Wye

The local people in Rhayader say those who put their feet in the Bwgy will come back. For centuries they have called the Wye the "Bwgy". Others tell how the river can change your life, just by looking at it.

My husband, Clive, and I had always wanted to explore the length of the river, from its source in the Plynlimon mountains in mid Wales, to its meeting point with the Severn Estuary 154 miles downstream at Chepstow.

The source of the Wye was a gentle little spring, bubbling from a grey, rocky grotto. A few feet down the river's life had already spread into brilliant green patches of moss and reed. We had heard the river's source was "undistinguished"; but I thought its very gentleness gave it a sense of drama.

Mayfly danced between rain squalls that seemed heavier than the stream beneath them as we made our way downwards, but we saw no fish. Instead it was we who kept slipping into the water. The little silver cascades of the first mile of the Wye have lethally slippery rocks and spongy banks that swallow your boots.

The river led us from the mountains, through forestry and farms, past a liaison with its tributary, the Tareg, to Glangwy. My abiding memories are of becoming lost with our heavy packs, among fields captured within barbed-wire fences; and the wonderful contrast of the friendliest of farmers along the way, who refilled our waterbottles and painstakingly directed us to deviations through their land.

We stopped at Glangwy farm and a small campsite. Down a short path through the woods was a lavatory and washroom, decorated with pamphlets of local happenings and a nest in the corner where a pair of sparrows were hatching their eggs.

Llangurig is the highest village in Wales, with its own full-time Post Office and foodstore. In the sixth century St Curig strode across the Plynlimon Pass to build its riverside church. We crossed a sturdy bridge to walk along the narrow un-numbered road that would become a path along the way. The river ran fat and then slow, like an old-fashioned dance, moving us between the greatest solitude, and vivid human encounter.

"You can forget One Man and His Dog!" announced Veronica Morgan, after she and her husband, Derek, had invited us to camp on their idyllic farm by the Wye. They run 800 sheep on 10,000 acres of common hillside land where they and their neighbours have grazing rights. "Every farmer around here has at least six dogs."

At Nanneth Fawr on the way to Rhayader we met André Gallagher, whose farmhouse self-catering accommodation has won a Prince of Wales Award. It is also a working farm with 600 Radnor ewes on the hills.

We consumed Guinness and exquisite steak and kidney pie at the 14th-century Triangle Inn, once patronised by monks from Strata Florida, drovers, and judges visiting to preside over the town's Assize Court. The court was removed after one of the judges was murdered on his way to church.

In Rhayader, a local mountain bike hire shop advertised "Dirty Weekends" up steep trails. Pony trekking and fishing were also available; and a choice between campsites or cosy bed and breakfasts.

From here also began the official Wye Walk that runs all the way to Chepstow, but was going to take us as far as Glasbury to become united with our canoe.

The history of the Wye is written on its riverbed. At places where the river was fordable, towns and villages grew up; and lives were changed for ever.

Launching our borrowed canoe from above Glasbury Bridge, we set off to paddle the hundred miles of navigable river that winds its way to Chepstow; past Hay-on-Wye, the pretty town of books declared by King Richard de Booth to be his independent kingdom; past the ruins of Clifford castle and over the border between England and Wales to Whitney Toll Bridge, shallows and rapids with rocks seeking to bite the canoe, or long green weed stretching underwater.

Hereford seemed overwhelmingly large as we arrived. We sat on the bank to eat fish and chips and then paddled on past Hampton Bishop to Holme Lacey Bridge. Apples bobbed round the edges of the river at Lucksall campsite, where we stayed. From here on, there were also more landing places, pubs and signs of human recreation, with anglers along the way and occasionally the flurry of a river raft.

Enchanting Goodrich castle was reflected several times next morning as we wove our way past banks spread with wild flowers, gardens of the dwellings of water rats or voles. It was easy to see why the walk between Hay and Chepstow is only 75 miles long, whereas by canoe it is nearer a hundred.

We stayed at the immaculate hut of George Woodward, auxiliary bailiff and dedicated gillie for a stretch of the river near Welsh Bicknor. We felt privileged to stay in the gillie hut, learning about the lives of salmon, who can voyage as far as the Arctic before returning to their river to spawn; and later went out, under a hunter's moon, to watch the National River Association workers patrolling the river for poachers.

From Welsh Bicknor, we negotiated rapids at Symonds Yat. And by lunchtime we were eating "Death by Chocolate Cake" at The Boat Inn, Redbrook, where the last recorded act of piracy on the river Wye took place. The inn's speciality gave us the energy to haul the canoe up 35ft of mud bank at Tintern, where the

The author, Rosie Swale, and her husband, Clive, paddle their borrowed canoe at Brock weir near Tintern, close to the end of their 154-mile journey from the river's source

How to follow the river Wye

Wordsworth's verses on Tintern seemed less appropriate at the time than stories of how, from the area nearby, called Botany Bay, convicts were given a last chance to bargain for their freedom with their escorts before being shipped in chains to Van Diemen's Land. Our struggle was worth it. We were made welcome in our muddy clothes at The Tintern Anchor and afterwards were permitted to pitch our tent on the village green.

After a hard effort against wind and tide, we arrived the next day, past looming cliffs and the castle, at Chepstow. Our 154-mile walk and paddle had taken us just two and a half weeks.

THE TIMES

Fly two-for-one to Europe from £99

From the glory that is Venice to the elegance of Vienna and the green hills of Ireland, The Times offers you two-for-one flights and weekend breaks to a wide selection of European destinations at prices starting as low as £99 for two people.

The offer includes scheduled flights with major airlines including Aer Lingus and Austrian Airlines. Accommodation is in a range of three and four-star hotels and includes the Jolly Hotels group in Italy and Radisson Hotels International throughout Europe.

If you want a holiday where you can take things slowly, try Ireland. Dublin, the elegant 18th century capital, has a fine collection of Rembrandts in its National Gallery - and a fine selection of Irish stout and other distinctive beers in its many pubs, where the conversation and the music go on late into the night. If you go to Cork, make sure you take the six-mile trip to Blarney Castle where you can kiss the famous stone.

Italy offers a choice of seven northern cities. Explore the fine old centre of Turin, capital of Piedmont and once an essential part of any grand tour. Milan offers superb shopping, opera and football and dazzling nightlife. Or marvel at the tower at Pisa, where Galileo conducted experiments on gravity.

At Bologna the city's arcades provided cover for assassins in the middle ages, and its university - the first in Europe, founded more than 900 years ago - is still famed for law and medicine.

Vienna, familiar to many Britons only from the film The Third Man, has regained its position as a gateway between East and West: an elegant city that was once the capital of a mighty empire.

Readers in the north of England have the chance to fly from Manchester to Zurich and Copenhagen. All other flights are from Heathrow.

TO BOOK: Collect three tokens from The Times and one from The Sunday Times. A token will appear each day in The Times until Friday. Send in your tokens with the registration form. You will be contacted by a reservations adviser. Please read terms and conditions carefully before booking.

TERMS AND CONDITIONS

- Collect three tokens from The Times and one from The Sunday Times.
- Complete the form below stating your destination, preferred flight date, telephone number and address. Send it to the given address, with the tokens. A reservations consultant will contact you to confirm availability for the preferred dates.
- Terms and conditions may vary according to the airline. Full details are available upon request.
- The two-for-one offer applies to scheduled economy fares only. All flights and accommodation are subject to availability. Extra flights available upon request.
- Flights must be booked at least 14 days before departure. The offer is valid until March 31 1995 and all travel must be completed by this date. All applications must be received by November 30, 1994. Bookings for Amsterdam, Brussels, Frankfurt and Paris must be confirmed and full payment received before October 31, 1994.
- Two-for-one offers are valid for departures from November 1 to December 14 1994 and January 10 to March 31, 1995.
- Flight-only prices do not include airport departure or security charges, which are levied per person. Weekend break prices include all taxes. Transfers to and from the airport are not included.
- This offer is not valid during Easter, Christmas and New Year periods and all public holidays.
- This offer is organised in conjunction with Travel Services (ABTA 7541, Aol 2676).
- Once a booking is made, any alteration must be made in writing and an administration charge of £25 is payable. Under the terms and conditions you may be liable for the total cost of flights and holidays if an alteration or cancellation is made.
- Travel insurance must be bought through Travel Services at £15 per person. An administration fee of £10 per person is payable if insurance cover is placed elsewhere and the certificate is approved.
- Bookings will only be confirmed on receipt of a £25 deposit plus the insurance premium per person, unless the application is made less than eight weeks before departure, when payment in full will be required. All balances must be paid in full eight weeks before departure.
- All prices are based on departures from Heathrow except those listed as departing from Manchester only. Departures to Dublin, Amsterdam, Brussels and Paris are available from other UK airports; prices will be given on request.
- IMPORTANT: These offers are based on the conditions set by each individual airline and are generally based on weekend departures. They must either include a Saturday night stay or in some cases a minimum number of nights, up to a maximum stay of one month. They are based on two people travelling together on the same itinerary and, where applicable, sharing a twin room on a bed and breakfast basis. A weekend break is three days and two nights, to include a Saturday night stay. There are no child discounts.
- Travel Services accepts no responsibility for any losses or injuries suffered by any reader who books one of these holidays with Travel Services.

GAMES

by Raymond Keene

THE NEW award system for readers who write in with queries and/or games has proved most popular, with well-timed communications and comments from readers pouring in at the rate of 60 per week.

Best games and queries from Times readers are welcomed for possible publication in this column. Please send your contributions to: Raymond Keene, c/o Keene on Chess, The Times, 1 Pennington Street, London E1 9XN. All contributions should be typed and in the standard algebraic form as used by The Times.

Any reader who submits a game or a chess query to me will automatically receive one free copy of the British Chess Magazine. Furthermore, any games and queries from readers which I deem of sufficient quality or interest to merit publication in The Times, will receive a six-month complimentary subscription to the British Chess Magazine.

This week's winners of a six-month subscription is Arthur Freeman. The game he has submitted was played in this year's Lloyds Bank Masters tournament and features exciting rival attacks on opposite wings. Ultimately, Black crashes through first. The notes to the game are based on those supplied by the winner.

PUNCHLINE

READERS are invited to write an amusing caption for the cartoon on the right. The cartoon, from the Punch library, includes the contemporary caption.

The cartoon will be printed again next week on the Games page with a caption selected from those submitted.

Caption suggestions, on a postcard please, should be addressed to: Cartoon caption 26, Weekend Games Page, The Times, 1 Pennington Street, London E1 9XN. The editor's decision is final.

The closing date for entries is Wednesday, October 12.

"But grandma, the IVF clinic did warn you that you could have twins."

The winning caption for last week's cartoon (printed above) was submitted by Mrs J.M. Stevens of Stoke Bishop, Bristol.

*'EasyReach?
The most cost effective way to put the brakes on wasted journeys.'*

If your team are dashing about all over the place, keeping in touch can be tricky. But not staying in touch can be trickier still. Your business could end up wasting time and money.

Mobiles are great, but you may not be able to put a stop to big personal call bills. EasyReach, BT's new paging service with a low fixed monthly charge, is the perfect cost effective solution.

Just a simple message, either written or numeric, will keep you in touch with your team. And as the message is clearly seen, you can give instructions without the risk of misunderstandings.

We want your business

Your business will benefit from being more organised, and your customers will benefit from a more efficient, reliable service.

The pagers themselves are particularly good for the more 'mobile' business, being small and light enough to clip to a belt.

So if you want to move your business up a gear, invest in EasyReach. Please call us now on Freefone 0800 222 660 to order direct or to ask for more information. Or call in to your nearest BT Shop to see EasyReach in action.

We'll be only too happy to set the wheels in motion.
